In the Name of Allah, the Compassionate the Merciful

Praise be to Allah, Lord of the worlds, and peace be with His Messenger, his purified descendants and his chosen companions, as well as all of Allah’s messengers.

This English version of Al-Fatawa Al-Wadiha, and its attachments from sikh Al-Sharia, is written, according to trusted sources, in accordance with our Fatwas. Thus, whosoever acts upon the Fatwas contained herein, shall be Fulfilling his religious obligations Inshallah (Allah Wiling). Praise be to Allah, Lord of the worlds, for us Allah suffices, and He is the best Guardian.

Translator’s Preface

In carrying out the task of translating this book, I have aimed at conveying the meaning in standard English, in the main, from a predominantly juridical Arabic text. I hope I have succeeded in that.

I also hope that this translation may help, in some measure, to make this subject accessible to people, who are unable to read and / or understand Arabic, and who are keen on understanding Islamic jurisprudence and matters of religious implications.

Although I have been liberal in translating the author’s introduction, I have done my level best to adhere to the text, but not slavishly.

However, I have decided to use the same Arabic terminology - appearing in italic letters - that is common to the subject matter, such as halal and haram (licit and illicit) with their equivalent in English, as a first reference. I have done so to ensure consistency, for the majority of these terms denote specific meanings on which the mukallaf (the person obligated to observe the precepts of religion) rely in acting upon the fatwa (religious edict). Thereafter, I have confined the use to the Arabic term.

To further guide the reader through the maze of this broadly technical terminology, I listed the words and phrases, with their English definitions, in alphabetical order under the Glossary. It is worth noting though that the glossary is solely my contribution and does not constitute a section of the book. Where I opted for the English dictum rather than the Arabic, I found it necessary, at certain instances, to put the Arabic words between brackets after the English, such as "rational judgement" - ad-daleel al-aqli. This has been done to reinforce the translated word or phrase and remove any ambiguity; you may not find many of these words in the Glossary.

Where I thought the meaning of the text would be enhanced or rendered more understandable, I have shown the additional description, which I must hasten to add that it does not constitute part of the original text, within square brackets.

The use of masculine pronouns, such as he, his, him, and himself, refers, where applicable, to both the sexes.

For the translation of Qur'anic verses, I used "Holy Preface

Qur'an", translated by M.H. Shakir, published by Tahrike Tarsile Qur'an Inc. P.O. Box 1115, Elmhurst, New York 11373, USA, although I have made some modifications as I deemed fit. For the benefit of those who would wish to trace the Qur'anic quotations, I have used crescent-shaped brackets to enclose the information concerning the numbers of surahs (chapters) and ayahs (verses), with an oblique / to separate the two; the first part refers to the surah, and the second to the ayah, at the end of the quotation.

This translation is based on the Arabic second edition of 1419 H.(1998 C.E.), published by Darul Malaak, Beirut, Lebanon. It also contains four sections on Zakat (alms) tax, Khums (20% tax) on net earnings, Enjoining what is good and Forbidding what is Evil, and Self-defence, which were taken from the first edition, 1420 H.(1999) C.E., of "Fiqh ash-Shari'a" - Jurisprudence, the expanded Manual of Islamic Practice, by the same author and the same publisher.

I would like to express my thanks to Hujjatul Islam as-Sayyid Hussain ash-Shami, the Director General of Dar al-Islam Foundation, London UK, who most generously gave of his time in solving difficulties that arose during the translation.

Nevertheless, no matter how wide the knowledge you have, and how sincere and good the effort you put in such work, it remains far from perfect for perfection is the exclusive preserve of Allah, the Most High. I, therefore, urge the readers to write in, should they find it necessary to raise any point or make any remark insofar as the translation is concerned.

In the end, I pray to the Almighty, to forgive me for any inadvertent mistake or error of judgement I may have made in the course of this translation.

Editor’s Introduction To The English Translation

Ar-Risalah al-Amaliyyah, or Manual of Islamic Practice, is a reference book for Muslims. That is, in conducting themselves, on a spiritual, as well as mundane, level, they should observe what Allah, the Exalted, has ordained lawful and refrain from embarking on that which He has declared unlawful.

In the second half of the twentieth century the spread of Islam in the West gained momentum. In part, this has been due to the migrations of Muslims to the new lands, especially from the Arab World, and in another to people embracing Islam. Regrettably, the first and second generations among Muslim immigrants started to loose their mother tongue, particularly in its written form. Their first language has become that of the host countries, be it English, French, Spanish etc.

The Religious Authority, or Marji', Grand Ayatullah as-Sayyid Mohammad Hussain Fadhlullah is known for his knack in recognising the needs of the contemporary world. He is aware of Muslims ideological and juridical needs. Thanks to his novel approach in jurisprudence and his wide grasp of the modern world needs, the intelligentsia, especially among the younger generations, see in him a representation of a trend which was set by Martyr Ayatullah as-Sayyid Mohammad Baqir as-Sadr in the mid seventies, and thus follow his fatwa in ever increasing numbers.

To martyr as-Sadr goes the credit of making a leap in the way fiqh (jurisprudence) is presented to the public at large. His was a down-to-earth approach; in his Manual of Islamic Practice, "al-Fatawal Wadhiha" - The Manifest Edicts, he made the rather complex subject matter of fiqh more accessible to the laity. "The Manifest Edicts" has been expanded and further improved by Ayatullah Fadhllullah.

Among its main objectives, Dar al-Islam Foundation aims to disseminate Islamic thought, knowledge, and culture among Muslim communities. Thus, it feels privileged by His Eminence as-Sayyid Fadhllullah's request to oversee the project of this first translation into English of the revised Manual from the Arabic edition. We hope it will fulfill, in some measure, the needs of Muslims, especially those living in foreign lands, and guide them through the maze and complexities of their day-to-day life.

Finally, we urge the readers and institutions alike to provide us with their comments on this translation, so that we could take it into account in future editions, Praise be to Allah, Lord of the worlds.

Preamble to the Science of Jurisprudence
Introduction

In the Name of Allah, the Compassionate, the Merciful

May Praise be to Allah, Lord of the Worlds, and Peace and Benediction be with the Seal of the Prophets, Mohammad, his Pure Progeny and Companions.

When Allah, the Exalted revealed to the Seal of the Prophets the most honourable of Heavenly Messages, He has guaranteed that it is on a par with man's nature. Allah has further ensured that this Message encompasses man's whole being from the cradle to the grave.

This is clearly manifested in the Islamic Shari'a Law. It is the law for all aspects of life that guides man's steps throughout, taking account of his special aptitudes and circumstances.

The Need for Ijtihad

The main sources of the shari'a is the Holy Book and the Sunnah (modes, practices, customs, and traditions of the Prophet Mohammad 's.a.w.'). Had the rules of shari'a been expressed in a straightforward and explicit manner, the process of arriving at such rules from the Book and Sunnah would have been accessible for many people. But, it had not been the case, i.e. the rules have permeated the body of the Book and Sunnah in such a way that the process has called for scientific effort in the study, comparison, and deduction of the rules. Such scientific effort becomes even more necessary, its tools and means more complex and subtle, because of the time separating us from that of revelation. This is particularly so when we know that the time lag has been responsible for the loss of many a Hadith (Recorded account of the sayings and actions of Prophet Mohammad 's.a.w.').

There has also been the need to verify the veracity of narrators of Hadith, let alone coping with the change of modes of expression; such change has made it necessary to develop new ways of making the text more intelligible. False hadiths that have pervaded the authentic ones have called for extra vigilance and scrutiny. Furthermore, the advances in the pace of life and its complexities have created unprecedented situations which calling for new rulings that should be deduced from a body laws.

All these and other reasons have led to making the job of deriving the legal ruling a rather complicated one requiring toil and research, although this may not be the case in some instances where the rules are very clear.

The Need for Taqleed

In all its spheres, life has continuously posed man with situations drawing on experience. So, no matter what discipline of life you are in, you will know that practising it requires certain knowledge and expertise, and that part of this may generally be available; however, a greater part is not easily accessible, in that it requires scientific skill. For example, in the field of public health, it is commonplace that when you are exposed to cold weather, you may catch cold. Yet, when it comes to the advice on precaution to avoid falling ill and prescribing medications, this is, to a large extent, the exclusive domain of the doctor, or chemist, who are trained in this field. The same goes for the other fields, such as construction, agriculture, and industry.

Every human being is therefore aware that he cannot shoulder the responsibility of scientific research in each and every discipline. This is because it is beyond man's ability and life span on the one hand. If, on the other, this were the case, it was bound to restrict man's thorough coverage of all the different spheres. Hence the recognition by the human race of the specialization of groups of people in the various disciplines. This has been a kind of distribution of work man has adopted by virtue of his nature since the dawn of history.

Islam is not an exception; it has followed this example by devising the principles of Ijihad ('lit. exertion' : the process of arriving at judgements on points of religious law using reason and the principles of jurisprudence) and Taqleed (the following, by a lay person, of a learned jurist 'Mujtahid' in matters of religious practice). Ijihad is the specialization in the science of Shari'a, and Taqleed is the trust of the laity put in the experts in this field.

Every mukallaf (Compos mentis: The person obligated to observe the precepts of religion), who needs to know the rules of Shari'a law, should rely on his religious general knowledge for a start. For those aspects of religious dictates, the mukallaf is ignorant of, he should rely on the Mujtahid (a jurist who has studied sufficiently and achieved the level of competence necessary to interpret Shari'a law). Allah, the Most High, did not make it incumbent on everybody to assume the responsibility of Ijtihad and toil to arrive at the legal judgement, only as a way to saving time and managing resources in all arenas of life. Allah, Almighty, also did not require the lay person to try to derive the legal judgement directly from the Book and Sunnah. He made it obligatory on them to know such rulings from the learned Ulema (scholars or doctors of religion).

Thus, Taqleed has become a religious obligation. Accordingly, Taqleed means the charging with responsibility. It has been termed as such because it entails entrusting the Mujtahid with the responsibility as though you are putting a necklace around his neck. In a way it is a symbolic contract between the lay man and the Mujtahid before Allah. That said, Taqleed does not mean blind bigotry and believing in other peoples' ideas ignorantly and without proof.

Therefore, there is a difference between someone expressing an opinion and you hasten to adopt it without trying to verify or substantiate it, and an express one that you follow with the full knowledge that those proposing it stand to bear the consequences of your advocating it. The first kind resembles aping which is censured by both the Shari'a and logic; the second is the true following that has been sanctioned by the law of life.
To make taqleed a water-tight enterprise, some jurists have ruled that it is obligatory on the mukallaf to follow the most erudite among the mujtahids, where they have expressed different legal opinions. Others have made it clear that the lay person has to follow those jurists renowned for their probity; all of this is in a bid to safeguarding the follower's interest in achieving the correct legal opinion of his religious authority. They have also been unflinching in their opinion of requiring the follower to switch allegiance to the jurist who is believed to be more capable and more knowledgeable than the one he follows in taqleed. This approach has been adopted to steer taqleed clear from blind following and fanaticism.

This has been the route followed by the believers from the days of the Imams (a.s.) to our present time. The Imams (a.s.) had made it their duty to instruct the faithful in the different regions to resort to the following of the jurists there; they did not tolerate any dereliction of duty in this regard.

The Prohibition of Taqleed in the Fundamentals of Religion

While allowing taqleed in matters of halal (Lawful for use, consumption, or to act upon) and haraam (unlawful or forbidden for use, consumption, or to act upon) in the branches of religion in the way we have described, the shari'a law did not allow the mukallaf to resort to taqleed in matters of religious beliefs. This is because what is required of him in the fundamentals of religion is that he should conclude his own conviction in the belief of his Lord, Prophet, Imam, and religion. The shari'a has called upon every human being to be responsible for the tenets of his religion, instead of following other people and entrusting them with such a responsibility. The Holy Qur'an is unequivocal in rebuking anyone who bases his approval or disapproval of religion on aping others, such as their forefathers, under the pretext of preserving their way, or as an excuse of doing away with searching for the truth.

Of course, the fundamentals of religion are (a) well defined, (b) generally in line with the human nature in such a way that understanding them directly and clearly is commonplace in the main, and (c) playing an essential part in the human life. For all these reasons, it is quite natural for the shari'a to call upon man to make a direct effort in looking for these fundamentals and satisfying himself with the truth. In most cases, such search for the truth is not an arduous one. However, if there were any hitches on the way, man is capable of going that extra mile to attain certainty, for his faith is an integral part of his being.

Nevertheless, the shari'a has catered for man's individual intellectual and cultural differences. Hence the tolerance in demanding the minimum from him in reaching his own conclusions and eventually having peace of mind in a measure commensurate with his own capacity.

Ijtihad and Taqleed, Ever-present Principles

Since all the sources of shari'a are preserved in The Holy Book and the numerous hadiths, the need for ijtihad as a scientific skill has to be continuous. This is to follow those sources and deduce legal opinions from them. It is quite natural too that the expertise of the jurists is widened as time goes; thus equipping contemporary ones with the skills necessary to making them more competent in arriving at legal judgements. This is one of the reasons why lay people should not stick by the opinion of any jurists for a long time during the occultation period; it is like adhering to the advice of a doctor despite the advances of medicine made after his departure.

That is why the relationship between the follower and the marji' (lit. reference point for emulation, or religious authority - a jurist who, by virtue of whose knowledge and probity, is qualified to be followed in all matters of religious practice and law by the generality of Shia Muslims.) is a dynamic one. It is further strengthened by the sanctity bestowed on the marji' in his capacity as the deputy of the Awaited Imam (a.s.).

The Role of Ulema in the Shari'a

The shari'a has recognized the existence of ijtihad and taqleed as two continuous practices going hand in hand with The Holy Book and Sunnah. It has also identified the mujtahid as playing a pivotal role in the religious affairs of the laity. It has therefore used everything possible to guarantee the successes of both the practices so that they may deliver their message at all times.

On the one hand, the shari'a has made ijtihad wajibun kifa'i (a collective obligation imposed on the Muslim community.), as will be discussed in section 17 of the chapter on Tagleed and Ijtihad.

Allah, the Exalted, has urged the believers to acquire knowledge and study the sciences of shari'a, "..why should not then a company from every party among them go forth that they may apply themselves to obtain understanding in religion, and that they may warn their people when they come back to them that they may be cautious". (9/122).

On the other hand, Allah has made it clear that the believers should hold fast to the ulema and have recourse to them, ".. so ask the followers of the Reminder, if you are not firm in the knowledge of the clear arguments and scriptures (16/ 43-44). The ulema were also praised by the Sunnah; The Prophet (s.a.w.) was quoted as saying, "The ulema are the inheritors of the Apostles". It has also been narrated from him, "Oh Allah! have mercy on my successors." and when he was asked as to who his successors were, he replied, "Those who come after me, narrate my hadiths and Sunnah, and impart the same to the people".

There is many a Hadith where the shari'a has induced the believer to be closer to the ulema to make use of their knowledge that it has deemed the looking into the face of the alim akin to an act of worship.

The enormous responsibility the shari'a has placed on the shoulders of the ulema is equal to the stringent requirements it has laid down for conducting themselves; a conduct that exudes piety, faith, honesty, and probity; a conduct free from any pomposity that may be induced by scientific achievement. This is designed to make them true inheritors of the Prophets (a.s.).
It has also been related from Imam al-Askari (a.s.), "Whomsoever among the jurists was mindful of his own soul, careful of his own faith, acting contrary to his own whims, submissive to the dictates of his Creator, the generality are allowed to follow him in matters of religious practice".

This is indicative of the meaning of the Prophetic tradition, "The jurists are the repositories of the Apostles, so long as they remained untainted by worldly gains".

The hadiths have also stressed the practicable and continued need for ijtihad as well as its continued legal legitimacy, in that the religion shall not be bereft of ulama competent enough to be firm in the doctrine, refuting the fallacies spread against it, and disseminating its true message to the people.

This has further been stressed by the Prophetic Hadith, "Throughout the centuries, the bearers of this religion shall be just people, who rebut the false interpretations of the impostors, the malice of the misguided, and the claims of the ignorant, in the same way the blow torch dissipates the impurities of iron".

Before we conclude this introduction, we have to mention, although briefly, the sources we relied on in issuing these fatwa (singular fatwa - religious edicts) which we called "manifest". As is evident, the two main sources are the Holy Book, and the Sunnah that has been handed down by pious and trusted transmitters, irrespective of their denomination. As for qiyas (deduction by analogy) and istihsan (application of discretion in a legal decision), and other principles, we do not see any legal justification to espouse them.

Despite its being a contentious issue between the theologians and the experts of the study of hadith whether rational judgement (ad-daleel al-aqli) should be admissible as a vehicle to reaching a legal decision, we could be considered among its supporters. That said, we are yet to see a single legal opinion that may require substantiating by way of rational judgement. All what can be proved by reason is already proved by the Book or Sunnah.

As for the so-called ijma' (consensus - of the authorities in a legal question), it is not a source for arriving at a legal judgement besides the Book and the Sunnah; it should be adopted only as a means of proving the Sunnah in some cases.

Thus, the only two sources for fatwa are the Book and the Sunnah. We pray to Allah, the Most High, to make us among those who hold fast to them, ".. therefore, whoever disbelieves in Satan and believes in Allah, he indeed has laid hold on the firmest handle, which shall not break off, and Allah is Hearing, Knowing") (2/256).

Divisions of this Book

We have inaugurated this discourse with taqleed, discussing the rules governing the follower, ijtihad, and ihitiyat. Then, we discussed the obligation (takleef) and its requirements, concluding with the classification of legal rules and regulation into four categories.

1. Ibadaat (acts of worship)
2. Funds, both public and private.

3. Personal conduct.

4. Public conduct.

We pray to Allah Almighty to guide us in His path. There is no success except with the help of Allah; "... and with none but Allah is the direction of my affair to a right issue; on Him do I rely, and to Him I turn". (11/88); and may the last of our prayers be: Praise be to Allah, Lord of the worlds.

Taqleed and Ijtihad

Foreword

1. In the religion of Allah there are orders and prohibitions. He holds His creation accountable for them. There is no way the mukallaf would know that he carried out a devotion prescribed by Allah, and refrained from what He has decreed unlawful, only if he is, in all what he upholds or forsakes, a mujtahid in the rules of shari'a law, or a follower of a competent authority, or one who practices ihityat (prudence, or precaution; level of legal opinion, or 'muhtat' - a person who is neither a mujtahid nor a follower, but bases his religious practice on either his own knowledge and ijtihad in the precepts of religion or follow a mujtahid).

This is true of matters that are not commonplace, such as the obligations of fasting, prayer, the prohibition of adultery and usury. The same is also right of matters that are clear-cut, i.e. they do not require a lot of effort or study, like some obligations, and the majority of the mustahab (voluntary and meritorious act of worship, and most of the mubah (permissible act) such is known by people with a religious upbringing; and example of this is the obligation on a wife of observing a waiting period after the death her husband; the same goes for a young wife who is divorced after the marriage has been consummated; taking to remembrance and dua' (supplication) and the permissibility of consuming fruits. These rules require none of these: ijtihad, taqleed, and ihtiyat.

Taqleed is not called for in reaching personal satisfaction through applying one's own acquired knowledge in accepting what is true or distinguishing between the nature of things. To give an example, you may be able to differentiate between water, wine, and vinegar when they are presented to you; the marji' may not, since he is absent. Therefore, you must exercise your discretion according to your knowledge.

2. Ijtihad is the scientific capability of the a person to deduce a legal opinion from the whole body of principles of the faith.

Ihtiyat is the execution, by the mukallaf, of any act which may involve an order or an obligation where prohibition is not possible. It is also refraining from doing that which may prove prohibitive or haraam where it is not possible that it is an obligatory one.

3. Taqleed is emulating a jurist as a paradigm. It is realised by acting, or intending to act, as may the circumstances dictate, upon the fatwa of a given mujtahid. This is sufficient for taqleed to be considered sound; this also opens the way for the follower to stick by the fatwa, even after the death of the mujtahid he was following, as will be discussed later.

Taqlīd

4. Taqlīd is the most practical way for people to resort to. It is quite natural to seek the guidance and help of those specialized in the different disciplines. Taqlīd is therefore an obligatory duty on everybody who has not attained the level of ijtihād.

The person who should be followed must be adult, sane, of a legitimate birth, believer, mujtahid - practising ijtihād is a prerequisite - and just. As for the condition that the mujtahid be male, it is a matter for contemplation. As a matter of ih-tiyat, it is also conditional that the mujtahid be among the living, if he was to be followed for the first time. This should not the case, if the follower were to adhere to the fatwa of the mujtahid, he followed during his life time, even after his death; this is also true, if the follower has sought the approval of a fully-fledged living mujtahid for remaining on his following of the dead mujtahid.

5. Suppose there were many jurists around. Is it permissible to emulate anyone of them, or does it have to be the most erudite among them?
   A. It is not obligatory to emulate the most knowledgeable. It suffices to follow any one of them, provided that he is a practising mujtahid as has been discussed.

6. How can a person know the mujtahid so described?
   A. He can be recognised by a number of ways, among which are:
a. The testimony of two just witnesses among the competent mujtahids, or luminaries, who are capable of scientific appraisal. The meaning of 'just' will be discussed under paragraph (27) of this chapter.

b. The follower own experience and first hand knowledge, i.e. if he had the knowledge which allows him to express an opinion, even though he is not a mujtahid himself. Finally, any other means that may lead the follower to reach certitude that particular alim he has followed is a jurist. Thus, he can be justified in following the jurist in matters of religious practice.

An example of this method is the jurist popularity, in that it could be widely believed within the circles of ulema and dignitaries, or within the ummah (world-wide Islamic community) at large, that he is capable of deducing legal opinion. This may lead to personal satisfaction that the alim you have entrusted your religious affairs to is really mujtahid.

7. Is it permissible to switch one's following from one jurist another?

A. Yes, it is.

8. In taqleed, is it good enough to follow a particular jurist in certain matters and another in other matters?

A. Yes, it is permissible, provided that when you switch to another jurist in a particular matter, you should by his fatwa, especially when you know that changing your mind again would certainly entail committing a wrong-doing (mukhalafah). For example, if you have shifted to a jurist who is of the opinion that a given act is haraam, then changed course again to another jurist who sees it is wajib (an obligatory act of worship), you are not allowed to change again.

9. The follower can know the fatwa of his jurist by one of these ways:

a. Face to face contact.

b. The fatwa can be communicated to him through two witnesses of impeccable character. Their testimony should serve as an evidence.

c. The follower can be notified by a person of unblemished character, or another whom he knows to be truthful, and reluctant to tell lies, even though he may not be just or devout in all his conduct; we describe this type of person as 'trusted', and wherever we mention such an adjective, it also covers that of the "just".

d. The follower may find the fatwa in a book written, or endorsed, by the marji', such as the dispensation on matters of religious practice (ar-risal al-amaliyah).

10. Suppose that the follower came to know, from two different people - both are of impeccable character, of two conflicting fatwa. What should he do?

A. If the two sources were quoting two different dates for their knowledge of the fatwa, the follower has to act on the fatwa with the more recent date. For example, the first person may be talking of a fatwa he knew of a year ago, whereas the second may be talking of a fatwa he knew of a month ago; the fatwa which should be acted upon should be the one related by the second person.

If both of them were talking of the particular fatwa, quoting the same date, the follower should not rely on any one of them. Instead, he should resort to ihtiyat until the matter is clarified.

11. The follower may doubt that the fatwa of the marji' has changed, and that it is possible that he has already changed to a new one. In this case, he must stick by the previous fatwa on the basis that it is still valid, unless there is a legal proof to the contrary.

The follower may doubt that the marji' has failed in meeting all the conditions necessary to be marji'. In this case, he must take the initiative to investigate the matter. During the investigation period, he must adhere to the fatwa of his existing marji'. If he finds out that the marji' is still fulfilling all the conditions, he should stay loyal to him.

He may find out that the marji' has fallen short of satisfying all the conditions. He may not find anything. Yet, the doubts have dented his confidence. In such a case, he should change to the marji' who fulfils all the conditions. As for legitimizing his past acts, he should resort to the new marji', if he knows how to go about it. Otherwise, he should consider them correctly executed.

12. While offering prayer, the follower may experience a situation where he thinks it could have detracted from the validity of his prayer. He may not be that conversant with the guidelines of rectifying the situation. What should he do, especially when it is known that he cannot ask about the remedial action while praying?

A. It suffices that he does what he believes to be right under the spur of the moment. However, he should consult his marji' for the right directive and act upon it. He cannot forsake such a consultation and rely solely on the action he took there and then.

13. If the marji' dies, what should the follower do?

A. He has the choice of sticking by the marji' or changing to another one.

14. If the follower chose to change to another marji', how should he go about the acts of worship he had performed, such as prayer and fasting?

A. He is not required to repeat any of the previous acts of worship, where the opinion of the newly adopted marji' differs from the previous one in such matters where the person who is not conversant with the rules cannot be held responsible. For example, under the previous marji', the follower was required to say once, the tasbih (utterance of subhanalahi wal hamdu lillahi, wala illaha illal lahu wallahu akbar) in the third and fourth raka'a (the bowing position in prayer) of prayer. However, under the new marji', he must repeat it three times. Differences of this kind do not warrant repeating previous prayers.

However, the differences between the two marji's may be in the rules governing wudhu (ablution required before the performance of certain acts of worship), tayamum (lit. intending or proposing to do a thing - dry ablution, i.e. using dust instead of water, as in the cases of wudhu and ghusl when, for specific reason, these acts are not possible), ghusl (obligatory bathing which is required after certain acts or occurrences), or the fundamental parts of prayer. In such a case, the person who is not aware of the rules would be held accountable, when contravening them.

In ghusl, for example, the previous marji' may not call for the sequential washing of both the sides of body, whereas the new believes that the order of washing must be observed. Here, the follower should regard all his bygone acts of worship [of this nature] as null and void. Thus, he should hasten to repeat the same, time permitting. If not, he should perform them qadha (in lieu - when any act of worship is performed at a later time, see ada').

15. The agent or the guardian of any person should act according to the taqleed of that particular person, for the simple reason that if he were to resume his affairs in person, he would certainly abide by the fatwa of his own marji'.

However, if a certain action runs contrary to the agent's own taqleed, he should resort to ihtiyat. This is the case in ibadaat (acts of worship). Insofar as mu'amalaat (transactions) are concerned, the agent should act according to the remit of the power of attorney without exception.

As for the actual person, he should be acting pursuant to his own taqleed, in that he has to consider the opinion of his marji' as the final authority; this should be the case not only when conducting his own affairs, but rather in all matters relating to him. For example, a particular person embarks on a given transaction, by selling one Pound sterling in cash to be repaid in a Pound sterling and a half at a later date; his arbiter in so doing is the fatwa of his own marji'. That said, the other party to the deal happened to be following a marji' who sees otherwise. In such a case, the second party should abide by the fatwa of his marji', thus ruling the deal to be null and void, and the money received by the first party illicit. He should therefore not allow himself to be party to such a transaction.

Any two parties may enter into a sale contract which involves offer by the seller and acceptance by the buyer. In this case, it is not permissible to either party to rule the deal valid, unless it concurs with the opinion of their respective marji'. The party who concludes that it does can go ahead, should the other party be intent on agreeing on the text of the contract.

The only exception here is when a person commits a wrong-doing through ignorance, i.e. not knowing the rules. In such a case, his action is deemed correct.

Ijtihad

16. Ijtihad is a collective type of obligation (wajibun kifa'ie), i.e. it is imposed on the Muslim community at large, in that if some members take it upon themselves to discharge it, the rest are absolved of the responsibility. Conversely, if all Muslims neglect the obligation of ijtihad, all will be deemed sinful.

The shari'a has not prescribed a ceiling for the number of mujtahids. It is determined by the need that may arise from time to time.

17. Ijtihad is of two types:

One is complete; the jurist who attains this level of ijtihad is called "an absolute mujtahid" - mujtahid mutlaq. Such a mujtahid is capable of deducing legal opinion from its respective source in the different fields of fiqh (jurisprudence).

The other is incomplete; the jurist who manages thus far is partially equipped, i.e. having attained ijtihad only in some branches of the shari'a. Thus, he is capable of deducing limited legal opinion.

Both the mujtahids can practice ijtihad, within the bounds of their own capability of arriving at legal judgements from their respective sources. Each one of them can express his views and fatwa. However, they are dissimilar in some other aspects as will be discussed in the following paragraph.

18. If the fully-fledged, or absolute, mujtahid meets all the conditions laid down by the shari'a for the marji', discussed under para(4), the mukallaf can follow him. The mujtahid can also exercise general guardianship (wilayah aammah) over the affairs of Muslims, provided that he is competent all round.

The absolute mujtahid qualifies to head the judiciary; by virtue of this he is called judge, or religious authority, (al-hakimush shari'i).

The fledgling mujtahid cannot exercise general guardianship over the affairs of Muslims, but his legal judgement, [i.e. in a judiciary setting], has a legal force, even in cases where he might not be more knowledgeable than some other mujtahids. It is permissible for the common man to follow his legal opinion, although his knowledge could be inferior to that of some other mujtahids.

There falls under the definition of guardianship of the mujtahid such things as safeguarding the affairs of minors, such as the orphan and the mentally handi-capped, public endowments, should they have no guardians of their own. The guardianship of the mujtahid over such affairs could be direct or through intermediaries.

If the mujtahid appointed someone for this purpose, then the he passed away, is the appointee justified in continuing to exercise his attorney?

A. If the dead mujtahid had appointed the agent (wakeel) to run the affairs of a particular party on his behalf, the attorney is no longer operative after the death of the mujtahid. The agent should therefore turn to a living mujtahid.

However, if the deceased had granted the person guardianship, by such wording as, "I make you the guardian over the possessions of this orphan", it remains enforceable, even after his death.

If the religious authority (al-hakimush shari'i) rules in a case based on the public interest, all Muslims should uphold the ruling. There should be no excuse for anyone who may think that such public interest is not important. To give an example, the shari'a has prohibited the monopoly of certain essential merchandise, leaving it to the religious authority to use his discretion to ban free trading in other types of goods by fixing such prices to serve the public interest. If he exercised such mandate, he must be obeyed.

19. It is forbidden for someone who is not mujtahid to issue a fatwa. However, it is not forbidden for someone who is a mujtahid, but not wholly qualified to be marji', to issue a fatwa by way of making his opinion known; it is forbidden for him, though, to declare himself an authority for the others to follow.

20. It is forbidden for someone to be judge, if he is not trained and consequently qualified in the discipline. By the same token, it is forbidden for defendants to be tried by him; the same goes for those who are called to give evidence before him. Any judgement of a compensation, for instance, passed in favour of any party of a lawsuit is unlawful to be had.

However, it is permissible for the side to have redress before such a judge. Should his judgement on the matter be sound, and the disputed claim relates to something tangible (ainan), he should receive back the same; if it were debt, he should obtain the permission of the religious authority to restore it.

21. The fully-fledged mujtahid may pass judgement in a dispute between two persons. Provided that he spares no effort in applying justice, no other mujtahid shall have the right to overturn the decision, even if the latter is absolutely sure that the party in whose favour the judgement was passed is not in the right.

22. Suppose the mujtahid passed judgement in a disputed ownership of a house in favour the plaintiff. There might be someone who knows that the house belongs to the defendant. Should this person conduct himself in terms of he knows of truth, or according to the judgement of the mujtahid. For instance, if he were to rent the house, whom should he approach, the first party or the second?
A. He should act according to his own knowledge. As for those who are not in a position to know for sure that the house does not belong to the plaintiff, they should abide by the judgement of the mujtahid; it is not permissible for them to disobey it.

Ihtiyat

23. Ihtiyat is the third way to pious deeds.

It is of two kinds. The first requires repetitive action; the second does not require it.

Here is an example taken from the duty of prayer. In the repetitive action, the mukallaf may not be aware that, in certain circumstances, it is obligatory on him to perform Dhuhr prayer by way of qasr (a shortened form of prayer - a concession for a musafir 'traveller' to perform a two-raka'a prayer instead of the full four-raka'a one; see tamam), i.e. two raka'a instead of four; it could also be the case that what is required of him is that he must say it tamam (a full four-raka'a prayer; see qasr). Yet he is at loss as to the right course of action. If he resorts to ihtiyat, he must offer that particular prayer in both modes, that is to say, once qasr and the other taman.

In the second, which does not require repetitive action, the mukallaf may not be aware of the rule governing iqamah (a shortened form of adhan, heralding the inauguration of prayer), in that he does not know whether it is wajib or mustahab (a voluntary, and meritorious, act of worship; see wajib - obligatory). Should he choose to apply ihtiyat, he could utter iqamah and offer prayer. This does not entail repetition.
Both the types of ihhiyat are permissible, regardless of whether or not the mukallaf was capable of arriving at the legal requirement with utmost precision, by way of taqleed, or indeed was not in a position to do so.

24. However, this does not mean that the layman can do away with taqleed by taking to ihhiyat. This is because acquiring knowledge, of the manner through which ihhiyat is achieved, requires wide expertise in the field of jurisprudence. It is therefore necessary that the person who applies ihhiyat be conversant with all the situations which may entail obligatory action to be taken, on the one hand. On the other hand, he should also be acquainted with all the things that may require him to steer clear from committing what could be haraam.

25. In addition to that, applying ihhiyat may not be feasible at all, in that the devotee may be apprehensive that his action may put him at loggerheads with the dictates of Allah, the Exalted, in any case. Thus, he will not be in a position to ascertain that he complied with what Allah has decreed lawful or otherwise, unless he has full and specific knowledge of the rules.

26. There is many a situation where the worshipper is not quite sure that he has conducted himself in the most acceptable manner insofar as the legal requirements are concerned. Hence the need for prior knowledge of the rules governing his conduct. This is because falling back on ihhiyat at a given situation may not be feasible without that knowledge. For example, the doubt in the number of raka'a in prayer requires the worshipper to be aware of the rules, so that he could take remedial action. The worshipper must also acquire knowledge of the means of addressing any inadvertent additions or omissions in a given act of worship.

In general, it is incumbent on every mukallaf, man and woman, to be knowledgeable in matters of religion and the laws governing them. Equipped with such acquired knowledge, the mukallaf will be capable of dealing with any eventuality.

Dereliction of duty under the pretext of ignorance, as to whether or not they are obligatory, is not excusable; so is improperly discharging them due to lack of detailed knowledge. To absolve oneself of the responsibility before Allah, the Most High, one should be sensitive to what is required of him in discharging his obligations, such as prayer and fasting, in the most acceptable manner.

Probity

27. As we have already concluded, probity is one of the conditions the marji' should fulfil. It is also a legal requirement in numerous other situations, such as:

Probity could be defined as strict adherence to the Islamic shari'a law. Allah Almighty has declared in His Holy Book, "Continue then in the right way as you are commanded, as also he who has turned (to Allah) with you, and be not inordinate (O men!), surely He sees what you do". (11/112). He also said, "And that if they should keep to the (right) way, We would certainly give them to drink of abundant water,..." (16/72).

That said, probity should come naturally and be constant, as though it is part and parcel of the character of the person thus described. There is no difference here between refraining from commissioning a cardinal sin or a petty one, nor between embarking on a tiring obligatory act of worship or any other act, so long as submission of the devotee is an integral part of obeying what Allah has ordained halal, and shunning what He has decreed haraam. As for him who is lethargic vis-a-vis Allah’s laws, he is among those referred to in the ayah (lit. a sign - a unit, or verse, of the Holy Qur’an), "And seek assistance through patience and prayer, and most surely it is a hard thing except for the humble ones". (2/45).

Among other instances where probity should be manifest are public guardianship of Muslim affairs, the judiciary, leading congregational prayer, giving evidence in court, and witnessing a divorce procedure. All these responsibilities call for anyone involved in them to be of an impeccable character and unwavering faith in the dictates of the shari’a. The heavier the responsibility, the more deep-rooted rectitude is required, for it is the safety net against lapses. This is true of the high standard of morality and integrity required of those who take it upon themselves to be marji'.

28. Probit can be proven by any of the following:
   a. First hand information and personal experience.
   b. Testimony of two witnesses of unblemished character.
   c. Testimony of a trusted person (thiqah).
   d. The person in question can readily be identified, through the way they conduct themselves, to be righteous, pious, and God-fearing; this is sufficient to call them thus, without the need to reach certainty.
29. If the just person succumbs to his frailties and, in a moment of indiscretion, commits a sin, they can no longer be described as being upright. If they repent, they may be recognized thus afresh, so long as obedience of Allah is the overriding characteristic of their psyche.

Obligation and its Requirements

Obligation

1. Takleef (obligation to observe the precepts of religion) is a bestowal of grace by Allah, the Most High, on man, in that He has distinguished man from the rest of His creation by giving him the power of reasoning to control his needs and shoulder responsibility. If man appreciates this honour by obeying Allah, he will be rewarded. Should he fall foul of the rules and demonstrate disobedience, he will earn the wrath of Allah and His punishment, for he did not do himself any good, by encroaching upon Allah's right, and not safeguarding the trust put in him, "Surely We offered the trust to the heavens, the earth and the mountains, but they refused to be unfaithful to it and feared from it, and man has turned unfaithful to it; surely he is unjust, ignorant".(33/72).

It is obligatory, both by virtue of the shari'a law and logic, on the disobedient to repent for his transgression and turn to his Creator. If he does not take to penance, this will count as another act of disobedience. Repentance can be achieved by showing remorse for one's trespasses, thus taking a decision to abstain from committing what is sinful in the future.

Requirements of Obligation

The following are the general requirements of obligation:

2. Adulthood (Buloogh): no one shall be obligated to observe the precepts of religion before he or she attains adulthood. Adulthood is determined by a legal criterion, the details of which will follow. A non-adult shall not be held accountable in the Hereafter. For example, if he or she were to lie or not hold prayer, they should not expect to be punished.

However, one should take note of the following:

3. a. This should not mean that the guardian abdicates his responsibility in shaping the behaviour of the minor. It should be his duty to steer him in the right direction and punish him, if need be, when he deviates. He must guard against his falling victim to Allah's wrath, when the time for obligating him with observing the precepts of religion comes. The more time and effort he puts in preparing him, using all means at his disposal, the better results he yields in making him closer to Allah, who said, "O you who believe! save yourselves and your families from a fire whose fuel is men and stones; over it are angels stern and strong, they do not disobey Allah in what He commands them, and do as they are commanded". (6/66).

Should the guardian do what is required of him to make his offspring follow the right path, he cannot be culpable.

4. b. Relieving the minor from the responsibility in the other world should not mean that one should not appreciate his obedience, and subsequently the correctness of any acts of worship performed by him. It is mustahab for him to do what is expected of an adult, be they obligatory or voluntary acts of worship, provided that they do not adversely affect his well being. A seven-year old boy, for example, should become familiar with saying prayer. When he completes his ninth birthday, he should get to terms with observing fast, even if during part of the day, should he not be able to carry on because of thirst or hunger.

5. c. Although the guardian is not legally duty-bound, yet he is by no means completely exempt from some of the consequences of the minor’s actions, such as compensating other parties for the damage to their property. However, it is obligatory on him to come up with the compensation when the minor attains adulthood; this will further be discussed under the appropriate heading in this book.

6. Reason (Aql), in the sense that the mukallaf can use his reasoning capacity in such a way as to recognize the responsibility he is being charged with.

7. If the mental situation of any person fluctuates between insanity and sanity, takleef shall be remitted in the first situation; it is applicable in the second.
A person could be so mentally-handicapped or feebleminded that he may not be capable of discerning certain obligations. Yet, he may be able to discern others. For example, a person with a mental age of a child may not be able to understand the rituals of hajj (pilgrimage to Makkah) and thus he cannot perform them. But, he could be fully aware of the fact that man cannot kill his fellow being. Imposition of obligations on such a person may be upheld in situations where he can comprehend the consequences of his actions; the opposite is true.

8. Ability (qudrah). Allah, the Most High said, "Allah does not impose upon any soul a duty, but to the extent of its ability". (2/286).

If it is not within anyone's ability to fulfil the responsibility he is charged with, no recriminations shall ensue. That is, irrespective of the nature of the obligation, be it a command - such as in the case of an ill person who cannot offer prayer - or the inability of another person to steer clear from what Allah has ordained unlawful, such as a drowning person, who cannot extricate himself from the danger.

9. The worshipper may not be completely unable to carry out the obligation, but doing so may cost him his life. In this case, the obligation ceases to operate with a view to preserving one's life, except in two instances:

a. When the conditions are right, there may be a case for jihad (lit. an effort or striving - a religious duty enjoined specially for fighting the infidels and repelling evil from Muslims); in this case it becomes obligatory.

b. When person is threatened with death, if they were not to kill another Muslim without lawful reason. In this case, they have to manifest obedience to Allah by not complying with the order, even if this leads to exposing their own life to the peril of death.

10. There may arise a situation where it is difficult for the mukallaf to make up his mind as to which of two concurrent obligations he should carry out first. As a result, he may fail to carry out either.

For example, a person may have to perform an obligatory prayer in the remaining short time, lest its prescribed time should elapse. It is within their ability and choice to do either at the expense of the other. Here, the obligation of the lesser importance should be abandoned. Very often, the mukallaf cannot determine the matter, only by having recourse to the marji' to show him which course of action to adopt.

11. When an obligation becomes enforceable, there is no difference whether the mukallaf abdicate his responsibility towards obeying what Allah has ordained, or by embarking on an action he fully knows will contribute to disobedience.

For example, a person may postpone saying prayer, preferring to travel by rail. Here, he may know very well that this journey is going to diminish his ability to perform prayer. This too is a type of rebellion against Allah's ordinance. It is therefore not permissible to embark on such ventures, unless in an emergency.

12. Being Muslim is one of the general conditions for takleef to become operative. An unbeliever is therefore not expected to be charged with any type of religious duty. Should the unbeliever embrace Islam, he can start afresh with carrying out religious obligations, i.e. he need not perform, say, past prayers or fast by way of qadha.

Adulthood and its Signs

13. As has already been discussed, adulthood is one of the requirements of takleef. Adulthood can be realized when any of the following features becomes all evident:

a. Secretion of semen, whether in one's sleep or while awake, as a result of a sexual intercourse, or otherwise.

b. The appearance of pubic hair, of the rough type, not down.

c. Completing fifteen lunar years of age for a male, and nine for a female as a matter of ihtiyat wujubi. It is preferable though that on his thirteenth birthday, a boy should be ready for takleef; thus he should not take lightly any obligation imposed on an adult.

14. If in doubt as to whether or not they have attained adulthood, boys and girls should assume that they have not until they are satisfied that it is the case.

15. Doubt may creep into the mind of a person that they are not capable of obeying Allah, the Exalted. They should not assume that they are incapable; they must spare no effort to observe religious dictates until proven incapable.
Acts of Worship (Ibadaat)

Foreword

1. Allah, the Exalted, has ordained that the mukallaf carry out certain acts for His sake as a sign of submission to Him. Such devotions shall not be considered properly executed unless they are embarked upon with the niyyah of qurbah to Him. These observances are called acts of worship.

There are other things which Allah has recommended that His servants carry out. But He did not make it obligatory that they carry them out on the same principle of niyyah of qurbah. Thus, the servant is free to observe such acts either for Allah's sake or for the person's own reasons. Either way, they should both be appropriate and proper. These devotions are called Tawsilaat (done for their expected good).

2. In Shari'a Law, Ibadaat consists of taharah (wudhu, ghusl, and tayamum), prayer, adhan 'the call for prayer", iqamah "the inaugural part of prayer; a shortened form of adhan", and prayer itself), fasting, i'tikaf "applying oneself zealously to the service of Allah, usually in a mosque", hajj, umrah, tawaf, zakah, khums, jihad "lit. an effort or striving. Holy war - against the infidels, especially in self-defence", kafigarah, itq "freeing of a slave".

Others, among obligatory as well as recommended devotions, could be personal hygiene, of body and clothes, spending one's money on spouse and relatives, maintaining one's kinship, teaching shari'a rules, shrouding the dead and burying them, settlement of debt, returning what is deposited in trust, giving counsel to those who seek it, being good to one's parents, returning the greeting, fighting oppression, enjoining what is good, and forbidding what is evil, rescuing the human soul in peril, reciting the Holy Qur'an, and paying respect to the holy shrines of the Prophet (s.a.w.) and the Imams (a.s.).

3. What is meant by niyyah of qurbah (intention of seeking proximity to Allah, the Most High) is that you should commission the action for His sake. This should be your motive for embarking on the action. Of a secondary importance is whether the cause for the actions was fear of Allah's punishment, desire of His reward, or love of and faith in that He is worthy of obedience. Holding such a worship would be proper if it stemmed from the intention of seeking closeness to Him. Making the niyyah by specifying that particular act of worship is wajib or mustahab is immaterial.

4. If the mukallaf carried out the obligation, such as maintaining his spouse, with the niyyah of qurbah, they would spare themselves the scourge of Allah's wrath and reap, by Allah's grace, His reward. If, however, their reasons for commissioning the action were, say, their love for their wife per se, they would ward off the punishment, but would not qualify for the reward.

By the same token, if the rich spend of their wealth in any of the avenues of good, with the niyyah of qurbah, they would certainly warrant Allah's reward, and their benevolence would fall under the banner of sadaqah. If they did not contemplate such a niyyah, they would not achieve the reward. However, in most circumstances, Allah would make them a favour by accepting their deeds, for He is the Most Benevolent.

5. If the mukallaf carried out the obligation with the niyyah of qurbah and the personal motive, in such a way that if there was no personal motive they would have carried it out any way, they would be spared the punishment and reap the reward. As for obligatory acts of worship, the mukallaf should not expect to be spared the punishment, unless they take to the devotions with the niyyah of qurbah in mind.

6. The niyyah of qurbah would materialize whether or not the worshipper was able to determine the particular act of worship. For example, holding prayer facing the qiblah (the direction of Ka'ba one must face while in prayer) is an obligatory segment of prayer. The worshipper may be aware of the direction of qiblah, whereby they can say their prayer with the niyyah of qurbah. However, identifying where the qiblah could be may require the worshipper to ask. If the matter is not resolved, they may be required to pray twice in two different directions with the \textit{niyyah of qurbah} and without giving preference to any of the two prayers being the required one.

7. Should the worshipper know that a given action was not sanctioned by Allah, it is forbidden for them to commission it with the \textit{niyyah of qurbah}. If they go ahead with it, this will constitute an innovation (\textit{bid'ah}) which is \textit{haraam}. However, if they were not sure whether or not it was called for and that they were inclined to commission it in the hope that it was, they shall not be deemed sinful. This is called \textit{ihitiyat}, which has already be discussed.

8. Hypocrisy is commissioning the act with the intention of earning people's praise and admiration.

In \textit{ibadaat}, this is haraam because any act of worship performed for this motive is \textit{batil} (null and void, e.g. a contract becomes batil when it does not satisfy the divine laws of Islam). The person who commissioned the action would be deemed sinner; this, of course, is irrespective of whether they embarked on the action to covet human praise alone or theirs and that of Allah. As is evident from the hadith this is shirk (ascribing partners to Allah).

In voluntary acts of worship, showing off is not haraam; as such the action shall not be deemed batil. For example, if someone provides for the poor, kin folk, and be good to one's parents, not for anything else other than earning praise, love, and seeking fame in return, their deed would be deemed proper. Accordingly, they shall not be dubbed wrongdoers. However, they might not earn greater reward from Allah, the Most High.
9. If hypocrisy took place after the worshipper had finished the devotion, it would not invalidate the devotion. For example, having completed their prayer, someone attempted to talk about it to the others to impress them.

10. The person may be sincere in their devotion, having trust in Allah, yet they are ill spoken of and how irreligious they may be. In such a case, there is no harm in their showing off how religious they are just to rid themselves of that accusation. They are justified in their works and their devotion is valid.

11. It is makrouh, but not haram, to boast about one's devotions and good deeds. "... therefore, do not attribute purity to your souls; He knows him best who guards 'against evil'. (32/53) The exception being that if the others were going to benefit from talking of one's experience as it may spur them into obeying Allah's dictates, and that this possibility was the overriding motive of the worshipper.

12. There is no harm in the worshipper taking pride in their devotion, if they were accidentally seen performing an act of worship. This is because such a feeling is not makrouh and it does not detract from their name.

13. What is not of hypocrisy is one's zealous involvement in worship with the intention of winning others over to be devout or to set a good example and make godliness closer to their hearts. This should, though, be free from self-aggrandizement. Otherwise, it is hypocrisy that is haram.

14. Pomposity is the feeling of doing Allah a favour by one's devotion. The person might think that they paid back to Allah all His dues. Although this is haraam, yet it does not invalidate the worship. However, the reward for it might not be granted.

Yet, there is neither harm nor sin in feeling elated by one's devotion.

15. A given act of worship may entail some physical or psychological benefits. If the worshipper embark on such a worship for the sake of Allah and those benefits - such as performing wudhu with the niyyah of qurbah and seeking personal hygiene - would commissioning the act be valid?

If the niyyah was a sufficient motive for the worshipper to embark on that act of worship, i.e. even without considering the benefits, the act is valid. If the urge for commissioning the action was not exclusive for Allah, i.e. coupled with those additional benefits, the prayer shall be deemed batil.

16. Faith is a fundamental condition for the acceptability of any worship.

17. Uttering the niyyah of qurbah for any act of worship is not a condition. It is an attitude of mind.

18. Generally speaking, taking to voluntary acts of worship discreetly is more superior than performing them openly. The exception is that of a devotee embarking on a public worship to make the devotion a catalyst to Allah's Obedience.

19. Standing in for a living person, i.e. performing acts of worship for them, is not permissible. For example, one cannot perform prayer for a relative, a friend, or any other living soul. This goes for both obligatory and voluntary prayers. Such a devotion by proxy is not acceptable. Mustahab hajj, tawaf, and umrah fall outside such prohibition. In a special case, which will be discussed later, obligatory hajj performed by proxy should be valid.

However, this does not mean that a person cannot carry out certain other voluntary obligations, in all the avenues of good, on behalf of other people. Providing for the poor and performing visitation to the holy shrines are just two examples of such works.

Should a person feel the need to do another one a service by way of worship, they are free to do so by performing that particular act of worship directly, i.e. without the niyyah of performing it by proxy. They could then ask Allah to accept it and register its thawab (reward) for the intended person, in the trust that it will be accepted.

20. It is permissible to perform all acts of worship, be they wajib or mustahab, for someone who had passed away. Likewise, performing such acts directly by the person carrying out the devotion and dedicating the potential thawab to the deceased, as has already been discussed in the previous paragraph, is in order.

21. Just volunteering to perform acts of worship for another person is in order, so is hiring someone for the same purpose. However, there is a fundamental condition for the validity of the work. The overriding objective for the person charged with the task should be the fear of Allah, the Exalted that they could be receiving the remuneration without their being ready and able to fully honour the commitment.

It is sufficient for the hired person to acquire this minimum level of niyyah of qurbah, whiteout which any act of worship would not be deemed acceptable. Should the hired person be ready to receive payment at any rate, i.e. without being able to receive the money unless they carried the work out, their proxy shall not be in order and the work not be deemed sound. This is because their objective has been pure business, in that they were not mindful of their duty towards Allah and safeguarding His right.

22. Regardless of a person's sincere worship and submission to his Creator, it is haram to assume that they are beyond His punishment. By the same token, it is haram for them to give up all hope on Allah's mercy and forgiveness, irrespective of what misdemeanours or sins they may have committed.

Assumption of being spared Allah's chastisement or being denied His mercy are among cardinal sins.

23. Acts of worship are not confined to certain devotions such as prayer and fasting. From a shari‘a law standpoint, a person can transform all work in different spheres of life to acts of worship, if they carried them out for the sake of Allah and in the trust that they meet with His acceptance.

This was an outline of the rules and regulations of ibadaat. We will discuss each of which in some detail in the following order:
Acts of Worship (ibadaat)

a. First things first. Prayer is the backbone of all acts of worship.

b. We have given preference to matters of taharah because it is a prerequisite for prayer.

c. We shall touch on the rules of hajj since they have been discussed extensively in a separate treatise called Manasikul Hajj.

d. Although zakah and khums are among ibadaat, yet we shall discuss them under section two of the Book because their financial dimension is more salient and more important. Jihad will be discussed under section four because it falls within the remit of the code of general conduct.

Accordingly, we will deal with ibadaat, starting with taharah, then prayer and fast, then i'tikaf, followed by haji and umrah. We will conclude the first section with kaffarah.

Rules Governing Water

Foreword

Prayer is the most important act of worship. It is the pillar of religion. The Law-giver has ordained that the person saying prayer must be tahir of khabath (material uncleanness 'najasah', such as blood, urine, excrement, dead bodies... etc.) and hadath (immaterial uncleanness) that requires wudhu or ghusl, such as janabah.

Khabath could be removed by washing with pure (tahir) water and other means like soil or dust which should restore taharah to the najis object.

Hadath could be eliminated and taharah restored by wudhu or ghusl with pure water or by tayamum with dust.

Discussion of all aspects relating to this area shall ensue, Inshallah (God willing).

Since tahir water is the main purifying agent, we have to talk about it and its types. Matters of discussion shall revolve around whether water can be deemed tahir, and retain its characteristics in order to be used for purifying and cleansing najis objects.
Types of Water

1. Water can be classified into two types, pure and mixed, each of which has its own set of rules.

   Pure water is that type of water mentioned in the Qur'anic ayah (verse or sentence of the Holy Qur'an), "...and We have made of water everything living, will they not then believe?". (21/30).

   It is the running water that flows through the water grid to our homes, hotels, public baths... etc. It is that water we and the animals drink, with which plants and trees grow and get nourished; it is that which we use to wash our bodies and clothes. Among this type of water is sea water, the water that results from the thawing of ice, snow, and hail, and mineral water.

   Mixed water is pure water laced with some other object, causing it to lose its properties, to the extent that it could no longer be described as water. Examples of such mixed water are tea and rose water. It could also be water extracted or pressed from certain types of fruit, e.g. melon water and lemon juice.

2. Both types of water, pure and mixed, are tahir. You may use them for drinking or any other purpose. The rules governing them are as follows:

   a. Pure water can be used for cleansing and purifying najis objects, such as utensils, clothes; it could be used for washing our bodies. Mixed water cannot be used as such.

   b. Pure water can be used for wudhu or ghusl. You cannot use mixed water for these purposes.
Hence the juristic technical term: Pure water is pure in itself and can be used in restoring taharah after occurrences of hadath or khabath; although mixed water is pure in itself, it cannot remove hadath or do away with khabath.

c. Pure water is not affected when it comes into contact with najasah, except in certain circumstances discussed in paragraphs (8) and (9) of this section.

Mixed water is prone to najasah and becomes najis on contact. Any source of najasah that meets with solid things turns them najis, irrespective of the amount of mixed water.

d. If pure water became najis, taharah could be restored to it once it is replenished with abundant water, such as rain water, as shall be discussed later. As for mixed water, it will not become tahir again, if it got najis irrespective of its mass.

3. Liquids, which do not fit the description of water, such as oil and milk fall under the cartgory of mixed water. Thus, they cannot be used to clean things from khabath or hadath; they become najis, if they meet with najasah. Taharah can never be restored to them, should they become najis.

4. Suppose you poured water from a jug full of rose water on a najis floor, only that part of the rose water, which came into contact with the floor, becomes najis. That is, najasah will not spread to the contents of the jug. As a general rule, in every situation that involves liquid movement in the direction of a najis object, what becomes najis is that part which comes into direct contact with the najis object, not the rest that remained intact.

The same rule applies to pure water. Please refer to paragraph (9) of this section.

5. Pure water has its own properties, taste, and colour. Its taste or colour may alter by adding some salt or dye to it. In this case, it is called altered water; nevertheless, it will not lose its properties as pure water. It should therefore be governed by the same rules. However, if the change was drastic, in that strange characteristics would emerge, it might change into mixed water. Thus, it would fall beyond the pale of the rules regulating pure water.

6. Pure water may change in character in this way, yet you cannot tell the extent of change. In such a case, you should resolve the matter by assuming that it still is pure water, until proved otherwise.

Pure water could change so much so that it might turn into mixed one. However, this change may gradually diminish, if we, for example, can manage to minimise the level of colouring by adding more pure water to it in such a manner that it should eventually restore much of its original colour and taste. Nevertheless, we could still not be quite sure as to the level of the remaining change. In this case, we should conclude that it still is mixed water until the contrary is proven.

7. Water can be divided into two categories:

a. Abundant water:
a. 1. Any water connected to a source supplying it with a continuous flow can be called abundant, such as that of wells, springs - whether flowing or not, streams, rivers, whether their supply comes from springs, underground water, or molten snow. This is so, irrespective of the level of abundance or scarcity beheld by the naked eye, because abundance here is judged by the level of the source of supply.

a. 2. For rainfall to be judged abundant, it has to be flowing on a hard surface, albeit in a little quantity. It will still qualify for the title of "abundant water" even after it forms some sort of pool or puddle; it remains thus so long as rain continues falling.

a.3. Stagnant water, which has no source of supply, can be called abundant, if its quantity amounts to a kurr (a unit of volume equivalent to 384 litres) or more.

Kurr will be discussed in paragraph(10).

b. Little Water is that which is not abundant, i.e. it has no source of supply, does not amount to kurr, and not rainwater.

Rules Governing Abundance and Scarcity

8. Whether it be abundant or little, water is tahir and can render things tahir from hadath or khabath. There are, though, some differences as to the manner of cleansing with abundant and little water, as will be discussed under the section dealing with mutahirat (purifying agents), Inshallah.

However, they are different as to their susceptibility to najasah. Because abundant water is really abundant and has a source of supply, it is not affected by najasah when it finds its way to it. So, if, say, urine or blood found their way into it, it can still retain its taharah. That is why abundant water is described as immunized (mu'tasim), for its abundance makes it impervious to najasah.

When the water is little, it is liable to become najis as soon as it meets with anything najis, such as urine and blood, or liquids that have become najis as a result of contacting najasah, like water and milk. The same goes for solid things, on the premise of ihtiyat wujubi; for example, a spoon may get contaminated with blood. If you wipe the blood off and place the spoon in a bowl containing little water, the water becomes najis.

9. If the najasah occurs in any part of the water, that is little, all the water becomes najis.

However, if the najis object was in a lower place and little water was poured on it from above, the najasah will affect the point of contact only. Let us imagine the opposite, in that the little water was pointed to the source of najasah from below, the najasah would impregnate the upper reaches of the column of water not the rest of the column.

The same rule applies when you point the water in a horizontal line to the source of najasah, i.e. only the contact point becomes najis.

To sum up, if the water was in fast flow in any direction and hit a najis object, only the contact point becomes najis, not the rest of the water.
10. In paragraph (7) we mentioned that kurr water is one of the types of abundant water. It is the water that weighs approximately 377 kg. [or 384 litres].

11. If kurr water was confined to one or more places, it would still retain its properties as abundant and immunized water, so long as the two compartments or more that hold it are connected with one another. Thus, it will not become najis on contact.

12. Water may be flowing or in some sort of movement, such as the water in the storage tanks in our homes. These tanks may be feeding smaller tanks, such as cisterns that are situated below them. Here, we may imagine two situations:

   a. The quantity of water in the tank could amount to a kurr or more.

   b. The quantity of water therein is less than a kurr. But, if the water that is trapped in the pipe network and in the smaller tank is taken into consideration, it could amount to a kurr.

      In the first case, the water in the main tank, as well as that in the smaller one, is immunized water so long as the water flows from the bigger tank to the smaller one freely. Thus, if, for example, blood falls in either tank, neither will become najis. The water in the smaller tank could not be immunized, if it is not connected to a flowing source; so, should najasah meet with it, it turns najis.

      In the second case, the water in the smaller tank is immunized, i.e. it does not become najis on contact as long as it remained connected to the main tank, whereas the main one should. So, if najasah comes its way, it becomes najis.

13. Any water, no matter how little it was, connected to a source of abundant water is deemed immunized. To give an example, suppose there was a brook holding little water. This water was being replenished with either rainfall, or another tributary with continuous water supply; it might as well be fed with water through a pipe, connected to a big reservoir. The water in the brook is judged immunized, as long as the water supply remained constant.

It is worth noting that the float in the cistern in a bathroom regulates the flow of water in it. If the cistern does not hold enough water that could amount to a kurr, the contents can be described as little water. However, it ceases to be deemed little as soon as you flush the water, thus allowing the cistern valve to open and refill the container. There and then the water in the container becomes abundant and immunized.

The water running from a shower can be considered abundant, if the flow of water through its holes was fast and unbroken. It should be deemed little, if the water through the shower holes was dripping, even though the gaps between the chain of drops were negligible.

14. One may come across a small storage tank and becomes doubtful as to its capacity, i.e. whether it constitutes a kurr or not. One should resort to considering its contents as little and apply the rules thereof, in that the water it contains becomes najis as soon as it is soiled with najasah.
15. Also, one may come across water below the quantity of a kurr flowing on the face of the earth and become doubtful as to whether or not it is connected to an abundant source of water. The rule applicable here is the one concerning little water, unless the doubt was based on prior knowledge that this flowing water was connected to an abundant source of supply; in this case, it should be considered tahir, if it comes into contact with najasah, provided that its properties did not change.

16. Suppose there was a tank, whose capacity is more than a kurr, full of water; some of the water was used up. We then became doubtful about the remaining quantity of water, i.e. whether it amounts to a kurr. How should we treat it?

A. It should be deemed as though it is kurr water.

17. In paragraph (7) it was mentioned that rain water is considered among the types of abundant water. However, it should be so abundant that it flows on any hard surface. This means that it does not become najis if it contacts a source of najasah.

Suppose that a drop of this rain water fell on a najis object, such as dead body, that drop of water would not become najis, whether it remained attached to the dead body or fell of it, so long as the rainfall was continuous.

If rainfall formed a puddle and a najis object fell in it, it does not become najis so long as the rainfall continued. The same rule applies to the water coming down drain pipes, in that if it contacts najasah, it should not become najis because it is regarded as immunized water. Rain water falling on tree leaves and streaming downwards to the ground is treated in the same way.

However, rain water leaking from a roof should not qualify for abundant and immunized water. This is because the link between the leaked water and that of the rain was not sustained. Continuity of rainfall is immaterial.

18. In paragraph (7), it was mentioned that spring water is considered among the types of abundant water. It is noteworthy that there should be no difference between springs that provide water all year round and seasonal ones. The water of these springs is deemed abundant and immunized. However, the water of the seasonal ones is deemed as such, only so long as the water keeps flowing.

19. In paragraph (7), we have stressed that all types of water do not become najis on contact with najasah. However, we further said that those types of water become najis when the najasah causes an alteration of either colour, odour, or taste. If the properties of such water change due to a fourth element, such as that it becomes heavier or lighter, yet retains its original attributes; it does not become najis.

20. Of no effect is the changing of the properties of abundant water that got mixed with an originally tahir object that became soiled with najasah. Of course, if the properties of the water change as a result of the najasah found in the najis object, it will no doubt become najis.
Rules Governing Water

Four example, a quantity of water became najis and discoloured as result of getting soiled with blood; this contaminated water was poured in, or found its way to, a storage tank containing water to the tune of a kurr or more; as a result, the latter became yellowish in colour. In this case, the water in the storage tank becomes najis.

21. It is unimportant too if the properties of abundant water were altered without being soiled with najasah.

For example, if the smell of a nearby source of najasah spread to the water, it does not become najis.

22. The change in the properties of water discussed in the aforesaid paragraphs does not necessarily mean that it becomes complete, i.e. acquiring the exact attributes of the najis object. It suffices for the water to be deemed najis, if discoloration, different smell, or taste takes place.

For example, if the water turns into yellow as a result of blood falling into it, it should become najis.

23. Suppose that a najis object was dropped in the water. The effect of this was non-existent due to either the object, the water or something else not related to either of them. Had it not been for this, the effect would have been tangible. Would the water be judged as najis?

A. There is a number of issues to be considered here:

a. If no change in the water properties can be detected, this could be attributed to the fact that the najis object which soiled the water has, for example, neither colour nor smell to give to the water. In such a case, the water is deemed tahir.

b. The untraceable change could be attributed to the colour of the water before it was soiled with it, in that it had the same colour.

For example, the colour of the water could be red due to a dye which was added to it; if blood was dropped into such water, it should leave no trace, in that it acquired the same hue of the water. On such an assumption, the water becomes najis.

c. The najis object may have its own characteristics which are different from those of the water. However, the untraceable effect on the water could be tracked back to something else beyond both the water and the najasah. For example, the cold weather could contribute to the untraceable effect of smell left in the water of a rotting carcass. On this premise, the water should retain its taharah.

24. If the water is of the type which is abundant and some of it gets polluted with najasah, does the najasah spread to all the water, or it should remain confined to the contaminated part?

A. Should the remaining water qualify as abundant water, it will still be deemed immunized water and shall therefore not become najis.

This could be illustrated in the following examples:

a. Suppose you have a big pond and blood seeped into one of its sides, turning the colour of the water into yellow. Now, would the water on the opposite side become najis before the colour of the blood permeates it? The answer is no, so long as the quantity of the water in the non-affected part amounts to a kurr.
b. Suppose there was a stream containing flowing water, the quantity of which was less than a kurr; it was connected to a main supply of water. Assume najasah soiled the middle of the stream, causing discoloration of the water in that part. Should the entire water become najis?

The answer is that part of water falling between the position of najasah and the source of supply should not be affected by the najasah. As for the part of water falling downstream, if there was still a trickle of clean water running from the source through the affected area, and forming a link between the water upstream and that of downstream, the najasah will be confined to the affected parts only. If all changes, that part of water falling downstream will become najis.

How should one go about restoring taharah to water that was rendered najis?

25. If water, that is little, becomes najis, taharah can be restored to it by connecting it to a source of abundant and immunized water. For example, if the water in a bowl becomes najis, you can make it tahir again by placing it under running water of a tap. Thus, as soon as the tap water blends with the water in the bowl, it becomes tahir again, i.e. without waiting for the tap water to spread to all parts of the bowl. Another example could be rainwater, in that it restores taharah to najis water, provided that the rainfall is continuous.

Indeed, the water discussed in both the examples becomes immunized, so long it remains connected to the tap water and rainwater. Furthermore, the bowl itself becomes tahir as well at the point of contact.
Should abundant water become najis as a result of getting mixed with a najis object, its taharah can be restored if two things were present.

a. The change that occurred in the properties of the water must be removed, irrespective of whether this is done gradually, i.e. by passage of time, or by adding more clean water to it.

b. The water can be replenished, while still unchanged, with abundant and immunized water amounting to a kurr, or by rainwater.

Both the objectives can be achieved in one go. We can turn, say, tap water on the water that got affected by najasah, allowing it to permeate the entirety of the najis water, through continuous supply, until the najasah is removed and the water becomes tahir again.

To further illustrate this, consider the following examples:

a. Suppose a water storage tank turns smelly. You may leave it for some time, to allow the bad smell to disappear. You can then add clean water to it, thus returning it tahir again.

b. Suppose the water in that tank turned yellow as a result of getting polluted with blood. You may add fresh water to it, using a utensil of a kind until the coloration is diluted and eventually disappears. Then the tap should be turned on or the water exposed to rainfall. There and then its taharah is restored.

Evaporation of Najis Water

26. If the najis water evaporated and by way of condensation turned into water again, the latter is tahir. The same goes for all other kinds of fluids apart from pure water, such as rose water and milk, and even urine which passes through the same process.

How would the water used for cleaning be treated?

27. Would the water used for removing najasah, by way of ghusl, or wudhu still be treated as tahir or deemed najis? And can it be reused in restoring taharah to najis objects?

A. It should not become najis, unless it comes into contact with the najasah itself, and it was little, or it gets altered by any of the attributes of the najasah as has already been discussed. If it becomes najis, it cannot be reused for restoring taharah. If it did not, i.e. retaining its original properties, it can be used to remove najasah, and perform wudhu or ghusl.

What to do when in doubt?

28. If a person has doubts as to the taharah or otherwise of the water, he should resolve the matter by considering it tahir. That is unless he had prior knowledge that it was najis and he was not in a position to tell whether it had become tahir or remained najis. According to this hypothesis, the water should be deemed najis, unless the contrary is established.
Chapter One:

Wudhu (Ablution)

Foreword

1. In Shari'a law, wudhu consists of washing the face, hands, wiping the front part of the head and the upper parts of the feet.

The way to go about wudhu is to wash your face with pure and clean water, starting from the hairline down to the farthest end of the chin. Then wash the right hand, starting from the elbow down to the finger tips. The left arm must be treated in exactly the same way.

Having washed both hands, you should wipe the front part of the head with the wetness left in your right palm, even with one finger. Wiping the upper part of the right foot should come next. The way to do it is by placing your right hand or palm on the tips of the right foot and pulling it up to the end of the foot. The same should be applied to the left foot.
In so doing, you should aim for completing the wiping process in such speed that you should not allow the moisture in your hands to evaporate. This will be elaborated later on.

Wudhu is called for as a way of taharah. The person performing it is rendered tahir. The taharah which one confers on themselves is upheld until they pass urine, stool or any other hadath. Later, we will discuss the things or occurrences that nullify wudhu as well as the requirements of wudhu.

Wudhu is an act of worship; it will, therefore not be in order, if it is not observed with the niyyah of qurbah. That is, it is carried out either for showing regard for Allah's dictates, or He is worthy of worship, or for yearning for His reward or fear of His punishment. The person performing wudhu should therefore do it for the sake of Allah.

In as much as wudu is both an act of submission and a voluntary one, it becomes obligatory in some situations, such as for performing prayer and other acts of worship as will be discussed in detail later on.

Wudhu cannot be performed without water for the latter is the means with which the person can wash their face and hands, and wipe their head and feet. Hence the term "taharah ma'iyyah", or ritual cleansing with water.

Wudhu should follow a certain procedure. That is, there are conditions to be satisfied, parts to be completed and occurrences that break the wudhu. It has obligatory integral parts as well as mustahab ones... etc as follows:
1. Requirements of Water Used for Wudhu

2. These are:

a. Water must be mutlaq (pure, i.e. not mixed), in that wudhu will not be deemed in order if it was performed with mudhaf (mixed, i.e. not pure) water, such as rose water.

Example

Suppose there were two utensils, one containing pure water and the other rose water and both were tahir. They look so identical that you cannot distinguish between them. In this case, you should perform wudhu with one of them and repeat it with the other. In so doing you will be sure of the validity of their wudhu.

b. Water must be tahir as wudhu is deemed null and void, if it was performed with najis water.

c. Water must be mubah (free for public use); Wudhu is therefore not in order, if it was performed without the permission of the owners.

Examples

A person knew that one of two cans, full of water, was najis and the other tahir. Let us assume that one belongs to them and the other belongs to someone who did not want to give them permission to use it. The person in question must do away with both the cans.

If they performed wudhu using water from either of them, their wudhu is not valid, unless they were aware which one of them najasah or belongs to the other person. They should therefore avoid that particular can and are free to use the other one for performing wudhu.

If wudhu water was tahir, it is not conditional that it should have never been used before, such as for wudhu, ghusl, or removing khabath as has been discussed in para. (27) concerning the rules of Water.

There is therefore no restrictions on using any water, that is both mutlaq and mubah, for wudhu.

3. Is wudhu in order if the water was mubah, but the can containing it maghsoub (usurped, i.e. acquired by unlawful means)?

A. If the person performing wudhu was using the water by scooping it from the can, his wudhu is valid. Yet, they would be committing a sin. If the use of water was by immersing one's face in the water, and it was widely believed that such action is disallowed, the wudhu is not in order. However, apparently the wudhu is valid due to the fact that it is commonly believed utensil itself has not been used.

It is not necessary for the validity of wudhu that drops of water scattered from the limbs and other parts of the body of the person performing wudhu should fall in a place that is mubah.

4. Wudhu performed with water contained in gold or silver is in order.

5. Wudhu is not permissible with water owned by the owners, except with their explicit or implicit permission. Doubt as to their acceptance or otherwise is not sufficient.

It is permissible though to drink and perform wudhu in water of rivers, streams, springs, with abundant source of supply, as is commonly acknowledged; the owners have no right to prevent other people from using it [for those purposes].

It is also permissible to perform wudhu with water dedicated for public use, of the kind found in mosques, schools, and other public places. That is, unless it is commonplace that such water is for the exclusive use of the worshippers frequenting the mosque or students of the school.

Example

Suppose that someone knew that the water was for the exclusive use of the worshippers who frequent the place. Having performed wudhu with this intention, they did not say prayer in that place for one reason or the other. Would their wudhu be in order?

A. Yes, the wudhu would be in order.

6. He who performs wudhu, not knowing or forgetting that the water is (najis, mudhaf), maghsoub, should know that his wudhu remains valid, unless he deliberately persuaded himself of forgetting. The same rule applies to the person who unlawfully gained possession of the water. Performing wudhu with najis or mudhaf water is absolutely forbidden.

Requirements that should be satisfied by the worshipper embarking on Wudhu

7. Without the fulfilment of these requirements, wudhu is not deemed in order:
Parts of the body, i.e. the face, hands, head, and feet, that are washed and wiped during the course of wudhu should be tahir. If the person, performing wudhu embarked on it with any of them bearing najasah, wudhu is considered inconclusive. However, this should not mean that they must clean all these parts at the outset. That is, if for example, on embarking on wudhu, the person washed his face only to find out that his left hand was unclean, he must get it cleaned, and get on with the rest of wudhu. Wudhu thus performed is in order.

The criterion is therefore that every part of the body should be tahir when he washes or wips it.

This is also true of the head and feet. It is sufficient for that part of head or foot to be tahir to be wiped, i.e. not the whole head or foot. This is going to be elaborated later on.

b. It is not essential for the place of wudhu to be mubah to perform wudhu in it. This could though be the case, if we were to apply the principle of ihtiyat mustahab (voluntary precaution).

c. Wudhu should not pose any grave danger to one's well being. If the danger is of the sort which is prohibited by shari'a law for the worshipper to stray, tayammum becomes wajib. But if they go against the grain of this injunction, their wudhu will be void. Tayammum should also be sought as an alternative to wudhu, if the latter should pose a lesser degree of danger, e.g. mild fever.

d. The niyyah of qurbah, in that it should be the prime motivation for the worshipper to embark on wudhu as it is a religious observance that is being upheld in pursuit of achieving proximity to Allah and for His sake. Any act of worship is of no value without such niyyah as has already been discussed.

He who performed an obligatory wudhu for Allah, his wudhu is in order. Thus, it is immaterial whether such wudhu was performed after the prescribed time for, prayer or before it. By the same token, the person who performed a voluntary wudhu out of submission to Allah and that it is mustahab, such wudhu is in order, irrespective of the time of conducting it.

8. It is also immaterial to specify in the niyyah of qurbah whether you are carrying out the wudhu as an obligation or a voluntary act, since your motives are gaining Allah's pleasure.

9. Continuity of the niyyah, during the course of wudhu, is a must. However, a wandering mind will not detract from this continuity so long as one is aware that they are still holding the niyyah, so much so that if someone asked them what they were doing, they can come up with a positive answer, i.e. performing wudhu for the sake of Allah.

10. If there was not ample time to perform both wudhu and prayer, tayamum became obligatory on someone. Yet, they contravened the injunction and performed wudhu. Would it be acceptable?

A. Wudhu thus performed is in order, except in one situation. It is the case of a person, claiming that the prayer, whose time has become very short, made it obligatory on them to perform wudhu rather than tayyammum. This is in spite of the fact that they know that the ruling in the circumstances necessitates tayammum not wudhu. In this case the wudhu is batil.

If the worshipper performed wudhu out of ignorance, or did so on voluntary basis, i.e. wudhu is called for as an act of worship in itself, or for, say, the recitation of Holy Qur'an, the wudhu is in order.

11. In a situation where there is little water, hardly sufficient to use for wudhu, using it to quench one's thirst takes precedence over that of wudhu. The person in that situation can perform tayammum. If however they could put up with thirst and preferred wudhu to drinking the water, their wudhu can be deemed valid.

12. Performing wudhu with the object of hypocrisy detracts from the validity of niyyah of qurbah. Wudhu thus performed is batil.

A sense of achievement for performing wudhu should not downgrade the niyyah of qurbah, and render wudhu batil, although the thawab is not as good.

Should the desired effect be cleanliness, cooling down, or shrugging off lethargy etc... which are considered among the benefits of wudhu, it should not adversely affect the niyyah of qurbah, so long as the main motive is trust in Allah, the Most High.

Requirements of Wudhu

There are three conditions that should be satisfied when performing wudhu.
13.a. It should be up to the person to carry out the procedure of wudhu themselves. That is, they are not permitted to depend on other people to do it for them, except for a valid reason, e.g. incapacity or emergency. However, seeking the help of other people in, say, pouring water from a pitcher or a jug into the hand of the person performing the wudhu can be tolerated. The same goes for any other part of the procedure of wudhu, such as bringing one’s face closer to the water poured from jug. Certain situations, such as sickness, may permit the help of others to carry out the procedure of wudhu. However, the person concerned should hold the niyyah themselves. The second party should do the washing of the face and hands of the sick person; where the state of the person permits, the helper may intervene in holding their right hand to do the wiping of the head and the feet. If this was not possible, the helper should do it for them.

14.b. The actions that form the whole procedure of wudhu should be carried out without pausing. Also, no time should unnecessarily be allowed to pass between any one action and the other, lest it should let dryness creep in to the former part of the body before finishing the one in hand. However, there is no harm in any part becoming dry due to high temperature or fever.

15.c. The order of the different steps of wudhu should be adhered to. That is, you should start with washing the face before the right hand; the latter should take precedence over the left hand and so on.

16. Should someone contravene this order inadvertently or deliberately, they should restart with the right order, giving due attention to observing constancy. If in rectifying the order one upsets constancy, rendering it void, they should repeat the wudhu.

2. Parts of Wudhu

These are four. Washing the face and hands, and wiping the head and feet.

a. Washing the face

17. The area that should be washed: After initiating the niyyah, the person should wash his face by pouring water on it from the top at the point of the hairline down to the tip of the chin. As for the breadth of the face, it should be the area that falls within the expanse of an open hand between the thumb and the middle finger. It is however not required to pay attention to what is left of the face, only as a matter of making sure what is required of them has been carried out.

18. Those with hairy forehead or who are bald should assume that they are not different from any other ordinary person. As for those with bigger, or smaller, than the normal face, they should resort to the thumb and middle fingers which are proportionate to their face. The person with disproportionate fingers should resort to using the average size fingers of theirs.

19. It is not compulsory to wash what is underneath facial hair. It is obligatory though to wash the exposed parts of the hair. This applies to both men and women. It also covers beard hair. The only conditions is that the hair should be thick and capable of covering that particular area of the face, e.g. moustache and eyebrow. If, however, it was so thin that the flesh underneath it shows, it is obligatory to wash it as well as the said hair.

20. It is not obligatory to wash the eyes while they are open, neither is it obligatory to wash the mouth, the interior of nose, the whole length of a beard, and the extended part of hair dangling over a forehead.

The Manner of Washing

21. a. It is obligatory to start washing the face from the top to the bottom; so, if one starts with the middle area of the face or the chin, wudhu shall not be deemed valid. This should, however, mean that one should religiously follow the hierarchy of organs in the face, e.g. washing the whole of the forehead, then moving to the eyes, and so on. If water is to stream down from the forehead either down the right eye and cheek, or the left side, the wudhu is in order.

22. b. It is obligatory that water poured over the face should be with the aim of wudhu. This could be done in any of the following ways, taking into account that the starting and finishing points be top to bottom:

i. Pouring water with one's hand, then using it to cover the entirety of the face.

ii. Placing the face under the tap.

iii. Immersing the face in a tub full of water, or
iv. Any other means.

Wudhu performed with such aim is acceptable. If however the water came into contact with the face, without contemplating the aim of wudhu, then, on a second thought, the person decided to give it a go with the intention of performing wudhu, it is not acceptable.

i. Assume water, such as that of rain, was falling over the face of a person then streaming down. Under the spur of the moment, they decided to perform wudhu with it. Such wudhu is not good enough. Conversely, if at the outset, they were intent on wudhu by standing in the rain, provided that the water covers all their face, even though they did not use their hand in the washing, their wudhu is valid.

ii. Setting about washing their face or head without the intention of performing wudhu, a person decided on having a wudhu with the water covering their face. The wudhu is unsound. Conversely, if they went about having a wudhu from the very start, observing the washing from top to bottom, the wudhu is faultless.

23. c. The water should directly reach the skin, i.e. there should be no barrier masking the outer skin. It is therefore obligatory on the worshipper to be aware of the areas affected, such as the immediate area surrounding the eyes and eyebrows. Vague knowledge of non-presence of an object masking the skin would not be sufficient to forgo proper investigation to ascertain the existence or otherwise of the barrier. This rule becomes even more applicable, if the person was absolutely sure of the presence of something, yet they were not sure of its effect in preventing or not preventing the water from reaching the skin directly.

24. d. The quantity of water used for wudhu should be sufficient to cover the whole face and be capable of flowing over it. Conversely, if it was little, yet the worshipper used it as though they were applying some sort of ointment, it would not be acceptable.

b. Washing the Hands

The second of wudhu requirements relates to washing the two hands, starting with the right hand.

25. The area that should be washed starts from the elbow and ends with the fingertips.

If the forearm was amputated, washing should be carried out of what is left of it. Should the whole forearm be amputated, i.e. from the elbow, or above it, washing it becomes redundant.

26. The hair growing on the arm and hand should be washed alongside them, irrespective of whether it was thin or thick.

27. Fissures at the back of the hand which are caused by cold weather should be washed thoroughly, especially when they are deep. Superficial cracks do not warrant thorough washing. If someone cannot determine whether the cracks were superficial or severe ones, no washing of the interior parts of cracks should be required.

28. If any part of the hand or forearm got exposed as a result of an injury, the exposed part must be washed. If a piece of flesh was left attached to the main body of flesh, it should be washed, even if it was only left attached by a piece of skin.

Manner of Washing

Washing the hands should be carried out in exactly the same way as that of the face.

29.a. You should start from the elbow downward, ending with the fingertips. Of no consequence is starting with fingers, or the middle of the forearm, upward.

30.b. The intention to embark on wudhu should be present right from the outset, i.e. the moment the water comes into contact with any part of the body designated for washing. If, for example, a person immersed their arm in water without contemplating wudhu, yet having moved and taken it out, they thought of having wudhu, it will not be good enough.

31.c. The person performing wudhu should make sure that there is nothing, such as dirt or deposits formed after sweat had evaporated, left on the skin which may form a barrier to the water reaching the skin. Such dirt or deposits, no matter how minuscule they may be, have to be removed before setting out about washing those parts of the body designated for wudhu. As for the dirt which may form under the nails, you are not required to remove it. That said, if the dirt extends to the areas, which it is obligatory to wash, it has to be removed, e.g. when you cut your nails, thus exposing the dirt.
The general rule is that whichever bare skin intended for washing must be washed, not its hidden parts. When in doubt as to whether this or that part is of the exposed type or otherwise, you should not worry. That is, unless you were sure that particular part is among the exposed parts, and that this certainty turned into doubt at a later stage, in which case you have to wash it.

Picking a prick that is embedded in the skin or flesh is not called for, unless it was protruding and forming some sort of barrier to water reaching the immediate area of skin.

It is also not compulsory to remove any crusts that had formed over a healed wound.

32. d. The quantity of water used for wudhu should be sufficient to cover the whole face and capable of flowing over it. Conversely, if it was so little that as though one were applying some sort of ointment, it would not be acceptable.

c. Wiping the Head

Wiping the head is the third of the parts of wudhu. It should be done with the moisture still left in the right hand.

The area that should be covered

33. Wiping should be applied to the front area of the head above the forehead to the summit. Trying to reach the scalp while wiping is not obligatory. Wiping the hair in that area would be sufficient, provided that the hair is not overgrown. Should this be the case that the worshipper gathered their hair in the area intended for wiping and carried it out, the wiping will not be deemed good enough. The same rule applies to the long hair from other parts of the head, if it were piled up over the immediate area of wiping and got wiped.

Means of Wiping

34. Wiping should be applied with the palm, or the fingers, of the right hand, not its back. The minimum is wiping with one finger. It is mustahab to do it with three fingers. If it is not feasible to wipe with the fingers, using the palm of the hand should do. And if the latter was not possible, using the arm should be the alternative.

Manner of Wiping

35. No particular way is called for. You can do the wiping, horizontally, diagonally, upward, downward, etc. The most important thing to be observed is that wiping should be done with moisture left in the right hand, and that it should be done immediately after washing the face and hands is over and done with. If a person used new water, irrespective of the quantity used, to wipe their head, their wudhu will be deemed null and void.

36. If the moisture in the right hand got mixed with a moisture from the other parts of wudhu, in a way or another, would this invalidate the wiping?

A. No, it would not, unless the water was new, i.e. other than water left on the parts of the body already washed.

37. If the moisture in the right hand dried up, would this bring the wudhu to an end?
A. The person performing \textit{wudhu} could use the moisture left in any other part of the body, such as beard, moustache, and eyebrows. If all the parts dried up, \textit{wudhu} should be repeated.

However, if the drying was recurrent, because of, say, hot weather or sickness, tayamum should be applied.

38. Nothing, no matter how small or flimsy it may be, should come in the way between the hand performing the wiping and what is being wiped. \textit{Jabirah} (lit. splint; a generic name used for any form of dressing applied to any part of the body as a result of injury or illness) is the only exception, i.e. wiping could be done with the moisture left therein.

d. Wiping the Feet

The fourth integral part of \textit{wudhu} is wiping the top of the feet.

\textbf{The part to be wiped}

39. It is obligatory to wipe the upper part of feet, starting from the fingertips to the ankle; as for the width to be covered, any area will do. Wiping will be in order on a feet with normal hair growth. If, however, the growth was out of the ordinary, the worshipper must ensure the skin is wiped, i.e. wiping the hair only is not good enough.

If some fingers, or part of the foot, were missing, wiping what is left of it will do. Should the whole foot be missing, no wiping is required.
The limb performing the wiping

40. As a matter of ihtiyat, it is obligatory to wipe the right foot with the right hand and left foot with the left hand. It is essential that the wiping is carried out with the palm or the fingers.

How to go about wiping

41. What is applicable to wiping the head is applicable to wiping the feet. That is wiping should be carried out with the moisture left from the wudhu water in the hand. As for the rest of the rules, please refer to paras. (36-38).

42. No doubt, the proper way to perform wiping is by placing the palm of the hand or its fingers on fingertips of the foot and gradually dragging it to the ankle. It would more likely suffice, if the whole hand was placed on the upper part of the foot and pulled over.

3. Wudhu Performed with Jabirah

43. Jabirah could take the a form of bandage, plaster, etc used to protect an injured part of the body. Wudhu of Jabirah is the one where the jabirah replaces the skin in applying the wiping. Such wudhu will be deemed in order in given circumstances.

People nursing wounds, broken bones, or lesions may have different requirements when performing wudhu, as will be discussed:
44. a. The unsound non-wudhu part of the body may adversely be affected by the use of water, but washing poses no danger to the parts intended for wudhu. The worshipper should go about washing those parts in the normal way.

45. b. If the unsound non-wudhu part of the body would be affected by washing wudhu parts because of its proximity to those parts, it is obligatory on the worshipper to resort to taymum instead.

46. c. If the cut, fracture, or pimple was in the immediate area of wudhu parts, and the place was tahir and open, in that it could be washed without the fear of worsening the injury, the worshipper should go about wudhu in the normal way.

47. d. The injury could be in a wudhu part. The place is tahir and bandaged. That the place could, after the bandage is removed, be washed without any danger to the injury. However, since the removal of the bandaged needed professional attention to remove, that was not available, wudhu and wiping over jabirah is sufficient, although one should, as a matter of voluntary ih-tiyat, do both, i.e. wudhu and tayamum, if the jabirah was placed on any of the tayamum parts.

48. e. Let us assume that it was made possible for the water to reach the injured area without disturbing the bandage. In this case, wudhu becomes obligatory, provided that the order of steps of wudhu is observed, i.e. from top to bottom.

49. f. Suppose that the bandaged injury was in one of the parts that should be washed in wudhu, that it was possible to undo the bandage, and that proper wudhu could be conducted without undue damage. The only problem is that the place of the injury became najis with, for example, blood or pus, and that it was not feasible to render it tahir. In such hypothesis, wudhu would be good enough with wiping the jabirah. That is, regardless of whether the najis place was common to both wudhu and tayamum, such as forehead, or other parts, such as nose, cheek, and foot.

50. g. In the undoing of bandage and rendering the place tahir, much ado may ensue that may lead to worsening the injury or delaying its recovery. It may as well affect the general well-being of the person; it is therefore obligatory that they perform wudhu. They should, however, avoid what could pose threat to their health.

Accordingly, if the injury was masked, wiping should be applied to the bandage itself, thus avoiding any potential damage. If the injury was not dressed, it is sufficient to wash the bordering area. The alternative wiping will then be as good as washing and the original wiping, as the case maybe. It is immaterial though whether the injury was self-inflicted, in which case the perpetrator be deemed sinful, or it was caused by the others.

51. Jabirah could be covering a part of the body that should be washed, i.e. the face and hands. It could be masking a part that is intended for wiping, i.e. the front part of the head and feet. It could be in the hand responsible for performing the wiping.
In the first case, wiping the jabirah should lawfully be a substitute to washing the part it masks. In the second one, wiping the jabirah itself should lawfully be a substitute to the actual wiping of that part it masks, if nothing was left un-masked. In the third instance, wiping should be performed to the jabirah when washing is performed on that part, and it should then be used for wiping instead of the original wiping, if no exposed part was to be found with which wiping should be conducted.

In order for the jabirah to be a lawful substitute for the actual skin it should fulfill the following requirements:

52. a. It should be tahir. What is of importance here is that the outer part of jabirah should be tahir, i.e. not what is inside it, in that there is no harm in its hidden part being najis. According to this premise, if the jabirah was najis, it is possible to restore taharah to its exposed part by securely wrapping it with a tahir piece of cloth. Then one can wipe it with a moist hand.

53. b. The jabirah or bandage should not be out of what is generally accepted as normal both in size and appearance. So, if it was disproportionate to the area surrounding the injury, wiping it will not do. It should therefore be made smaller where feasible. Therefore, if the jabirah's place was not in the forehead or the hands, the most applicable practice is a combination of wiping and tayamum, as a matter of ihitiat. If it was in the forehead or feet, performing wudhu of jabirah should do, even though the jabirah was covering the whole part.
So long as the \textit{jabirah} falls within what is generally recognised as normal, it should not be curtailed or trimmed. However, it is permissible to cover it with something else, even if this was not needed, provided that it forms part of it.

54.c. \textit{ Jabirah} should not cover all parts of the body that must be washed in \textit{wudhu}. Conversely, a combination of \textit{jabirah wudhu} and tayamum should be the norm. However, \textit{wudhu} by way of wiping cannot be ruled out.

55.d. It should be \textit{mubah}, in that wiping will not be acceptable, if the \textit{jabirah} was \textit{maghsoub}.

56. Unlike the case in the clothes of a male performing prayer, where pure gold or linen, or the hide of an animal whose meat is not for human consumption, cannot be worn, there is no harm in using a \textit{jabirah} made of these products.

57. Should there be more than one \textit{jabirah} on any given part of the body destined for washing and there were parts still not covered, those parts must be washed or wiped as is applicable.

58. If there was a need for dressing a cut, it is obligatory to wash and render the surrounding area \textit{tahir} before dressing it with a \textit{tahir} bandage, just to ensure that there should not be a need later on to cleanse the area.

\textbf{What should be done to other forms of masks?}

59. Any other form of screen surrounding the skin or attached to it cannot be treated in the same way as those \textit{jabirahs} just discussed.

However, if that mask was a kind of medicine whose application was necessary to the immediate area of the part that sustained the injury, \textit{wudhu} including wiping the area could be carried out.

60. Accordingly, if, for example, paint was present on any part of the \textit{wudhu} parts, and it was very difficult to remove, the person performing \textit{wudhu} must perform tayammum. If the stain was in a part which is applicable for both tayammum and \textit{wudhu}, both should be carried out, although it is more likely, as a matter of voluntary \textit{ikhātiyat}, that \textit{wudhu} alone will be good enough.

61. A \textit{najis} substance, such as a combination of solidified puss and medicine, may form a crust on a healing injury, making it difficult for \textit{wudhu} water to reach the skin. If this barrier was not in the parts of the body applicable for both \textit{wudhu} and tayammum, the latter should be performed. And if it was in those parts, the person should perform both tayammum and \textit{wudhu}. Here the place of \textit{najasah} should not be touched; instead it should be covered with a piece of cloth that is \textit{tahir} over which wiping should be performed. However, if by lapse of time the crust turned into something else that blended with the skin, it should be treated as part of it. In this case \textit{wudhu} cannot be ruled out, either by washing the surrounding area of the injury, or masking it by a \textit{tahir} piece of cloth and wiping over it.

62. In addition to the people who sustained wounds, fractures, and the like, any person, who are not feeling well for any reason and fearing that the use of water might undermine their health further, should take to tayamum instead.

63. People who have not received any injury, but whose wudhu part or parts came into contact with najasah, should perform tayamum. It is not permissible for them to mask the najasah and wipe it, as is the case in the wudhu of jabirah.

Whether the part that became najis is among those parts which are used in tayamum and wudhu, or the latter alone, is immaterial.

64. The jabirah must be removed when no subsequent harm is foreseen. Conversely, it must be left where it is; all rules governing jabirah should therefore be observed, even with the possibility of recovery.

The Effects of Wudhu of Jabirah and its Rules

65 If a person with jabirah reckoned that he would be able to remove the jabirah and perform proper wudhu, had he waited until later in the day to say prayer, which had become due, he should do so. However, if he preferred to perform wudhu of jabirah and say prayer in the earlier part of prayer time, this will not be sufficient.

If, however, the person, in the previous example, believed that waiting is not going to change anything, he is allowed to hasten to prayer as early as he could. If in the course of time for prayer, his excuse of having the jabirah, was no longer sustainable, i.e. contrary to their belief, he should repeat both the wudhu and prayer.

66. A sick person had performed wudhu of jabirah. Having said prayer during its prescribed time, his condition remained unchanged until the time of the following prayer. Since he did not break his wudhu, can he still say prayer with the same wudhu, i.e. of jabirah, although he can now perform proper wudhu, having no valid reason not to do so?

A. Yes, he can say prayer with the original wudhu of jabirah, although it is preferable to perform wudhu afresh and say prayer, as a matter of voluntary precaution (ihtiyat mustahab).

67. Should there be no excuse for retaining the jabirah before the expiry of prayer time, yet removing it may take up all what is left of the prescribed time. Wudhu is not permissible. Tayammum should be performed instead.

68. A person mistakenly believed that harm would befall him if he was to wash the injured part of their body. So, he bandaged it and performed wudhu of jabirah. Such wudhu is not good enough (batil).

69. If we were to reverse the example in the preceding paragraph, would wudhu and washing be acceptable?

A. This wudhu is deemed batil, if the harm was real, i.e. of the kind which sensible people would normally avoid. Whether the harm was great or minor is immaterial, unless it was negligible.

70. The above rule applies to the person who discovers that they were in the wrong as to the belief that harm could come their way. Nevertheless, they shied away from performing \textit{wudhu} of \textit{jabirah}, and took to \textit{wudhu} or \textit{ghusl} instead.

\section*{4. Circumstances Where Wudhu Becomes Wajib or Mustahab}

71. \textit{Wudhu} in itself is a manifestation of obedience to Allah; it is a means of seeking closeness to Him and eagerness to achieve His reward. At the same time, it becomes \textit{wajib} for other acts of worship, such as prayer, be it \textit{wajib} or \textit{mustahab}; this means that a \textit{mustahab} prayer performed without \textit{wudhu} is not acceptable, although the person has the choice not to embark on it at the outset. Also of no consequence is whether the prayer was performed on its prescribed time (\textit{ada}') or at a later time (\textit{qadha'}). \textit{Wudhu} is also \textit{wajib} for the prayer of \textit{ihtiyat} (reserve or precautionary prayer), the details of which shall be discussed in paragraphs at a later stage.

\textit{Wudhu} is obligatory for performing parts of a forgotten prayer, \textit{tawaf} prayer, and \textit{tawaf} of \textit{umrah} and \textit{hajj}. These things are called objectives (\textit{ghayaat}) that make performing \textit{wudhu wajib}, in that it will not be good enough without them.

72. \textit{Wudhu} is \textit{mustahab} for a voluntary \textit{tawaf} and all rituals performed during \textit{hajj}, for \textit{du'a} (supplication), reciting the Holy Qur'an, prayer for the dead, staying at the mosque, and performing visitation rites to the holy shrines.

These things are called the mustahab objectives of wudhu because they can still be accepted even without wudhu; nevertheless, with wudhu, they are more complete and superior.

73. When we discussed what is required of the person setting out to perform wudhu, we have already said that niyyah of qurbah is obligatory without which wudhu will not be deemed in order. Such niyyah is realised by setting one’s mind on performing wudhu either because it is called for in itself, or the person is desirous to achieve any of its wajib or mustahab objectives.

Since wudhu is mustahab, renewing it, even if it was not broken, is recommended too. In some narrations, it has been described as enriched light.

Rules Governing the Person with Broken Wudhu

74. Such a person is not allowed to touch the writing, print, engraving, etc of the Holy Qur’an, not even a single letter or a punctuation mark. The prohibition covers the whole of the body of the person, including their hair. It is permissible, to touch the paper or cover, the names of surah (chapter), and the numbers.

75. The same applies to the Qur’anic diction, contained elsewhere, such as in a letter, book, card, or ring.

76. It is permissible to touch the name of "Allah" and His attributes found outside the Holy Book.

77. He who wants to come into contact the writing of the Holy Book can perform wudhu for this purpose in particular, lest they should touch it, especially kissing, without wudhu, and thus committing a haraam act.

5. Things that Invalidate Wudhu

Technically, it is anything that renders wudhu void, i.e. by breaching the state of taharah. Each one of these things is called hadath. These are:

78. a. Passing urine. Apart from semen on ejaculation of which ghusl, and not wudhu, becomes obligatory, fluids secreted by male or female reproductive organs do not invalidate wudhu; neither do they render the place they come into contact with najis. This will be discussed in the Chapter dedicated to Types of Naja-sah.

79. b. Passing stool. Passing urine or stool invalidates wudhu, irrespective of the way they are brought about, be it natural through sexual organs, or drawn, or through an opening in the body, such as the one done on medical grounds.

80. If urine and stool found their way outside the body, not from the natural passages, e.g. through an incision, they invalidate wudhu, provided that their passing was not brought about by artificial means. If the latter was the case, it does not invalidate wudhu.

81. A person resorted to using a syringe to facilitate passing stool. If some of the water only seeps out, wudhu remains intact. If, however, there was faeces mixed with, or without, the water no matter how small the quantity was, wudhu is deemed broken. Doubt as to any or none of it was secreted should not invalidate wudhu.

82. c. Breaking wind from the posterior, i.e. there is no consequence to wind coming out from any other source.

83. d. Deep sleep, madness, drunkenness, and passing out.

84. e. Istihadhah (undue menses). This will be discussed in some detail under the topic of Ghusl.

85. Regardless of the number of hadaths, one wudhu would restore taharah to the person.

86. It is not obligatory on the person performing the wudhu to set their mind on removing a particular hadath, neither should they contemplate that they are performing wudhu to eliminate the hadath. It suffices to carry wudhu out with the niyyah of qurbah.

87. It is alright for a person who have performed wudhu to invalidate it, so long as they were in a position to renew their wudhu, in that water was available and they were able to use it. They can also invalidate wudhu, even if they were aware they could not renew it before the prescribed time of prayer; this is the case even with the knowledge that they could become unable to do it, depending on performing tayamum instead. After the prescribed prayer timer has become due, they cannot invalidate wudhu so long as they were not in a position to renew it.
The Incontinent and the One with Intestinal Ailment

According to jurists, the person afflicted with any of the two disorders is described as suffering from ongoing hadath. Rules governing both the cases vary.

88. a. There may be a respite for either during which taharah could be restored and prayer performed on time, even if it is curtailed as to include wajib sections only. The sick person should therefore wait for that point in time, be it at the start, middle, or end of the whole duration, to hasten for wudhu and prayer. Outside that time, the rules governing the person in a state of hadath should be applied.

89. b. The hadath may be continuous, or with so little room that one can hardly become tahir again, let alone say the whole prayer. In this case, they should perform wudhu and prayer. They are allowed to perform two prayers or more with one wudhu, for they are deemed in a state of taharah, so long as no other hadath, such as sleep, takes place, or one recovers to go to lead a normal life, even though for one day.

90. c. There may be a period of respite, yet it is so short that it can hardly accommodate both the taharah and part of the prayer. The person should wait until that time comes, perform wudhu and say prayer; He needs not worry if the hadath occurs during prayer. He should carry on with prayer, even though he may not encounter any trouble or difficulty in renewing wudhu. However, on a mustahab note, it is more befitting if he did not say two prayers or more with one wudhu. It is advisable if he performs one wudhu for each and every prayer, including a voluntary one, and that of ihtiyat.

There is however no need for a separate wudhu for sujood (prostration) tashahhud (bearing witness that there is no god but Allah and that Mohammad is His Apostle) which might be performed after the worshipper finished prayer, having forgotten to say them.

91. Any prayer performed with an unbroken wudhu is good enough, i.e. if a person performed wudhu for a particular prayer and maintained their wudhu to perform a second prayer both prayers are acceptable.

92. Just as the incontinent and the person suffering from an intestinal ailment can say their prayer, after having performed wudhu, so can they touch the writing of the Holy Qur'an.

93. Should the people mentioned in the preceding paragraph do their best not to allow urine and solid waste matter spread to the body and clothes?

A. Yes, they should do so, especially with the aid of modern devices. Furthermore, they should render tahir the foreskin of penis, anus, and what has become najis as a result of coming into contact, i.e. of body or clothes.

6. Deficient and Doubtful Wudhu

While wudhu could be deficient, i.e. not performed properly, Doubt is the uncertainty that creeps into the mind as to whether wudhu was performed as it ought to be.

94. If a person was certain that he maintained his wudhu and taharah, yet after a while he became doubtful as to whether or not he sustained a hadath, he should assume that his wudhu and taharah are still intact.

But if the person was certain that a hadath occurred to him, yet he doubted as to whether or not he performed wudhu to remove the hadath, he should assume that the hadath still exists and no wudhu was performed. However, if he inadvertently said prayer, i.e. without wudhu, the prayer is deemed batil; accordingly, he should say prayer afresh should there still be time for it; otherwise it has to be said qadha’.

95. A person knew he had performed wudhu and sustained a hadath. However, he did not know which came first. What should he do?

A. The judgement that applies to them is as though he is in a state of non-taharah because of the hadath. He should therefore perform wudhu for that which it called for. Neither the knowledge, or otherwise, of time of the occurrence, nor which of which came first is of any significance.

96. If, during prayer, someone became doubtful as to whether or not he performed wudhu prior to the prayer in progress, he should perform wudhu and say his prayer afresh.

97. If, on finishing prayer, a person had doubts about not having wudhu, the prayer stands. However, he should perform wudhu for the next one. This does not apply to the doubt occurring before embarking on prayer, which should have been addressed at the time and according to the rules.

For example, a person, who has just finished prayer, had doubts about the procedure of wudhu, in that he was not sure whether the washing of face and hands he carried out prior to prayer had been for the purpose of cleaning or wudhu. However, he knows very well that when he hastened to prayer he was not aware of this. On this assumption, wudhu has to be performed afresh and the prayer repeated. Should the doubt arise after the appointed prayer time, there will be no need to perform it by way of qadha.

98. A person, who is in the process of performing wudhu, realized that he had skipped an integral part of it. He should make good the defect and follow it through with the subsequent steps, observing in all what he does the necessary rules. The same applies in the case of a person who has just finished wudhu, if it was feasible to complete it without infringing upon the requirements. The lapse could have been realized after a while. And it just so happened that it was not possible to rectify the situation with due regard to the rules because of the length of time or for any other reason. In this case, there is no doubt that wudhu has to be renewed.

99. A person, who is in the process of performing wudhu, doubted that he may have skipped certain parts of wudhu. He should make good the subject of his doubt, following the same lines in the previous point.

Example

The person may have doubt about washing his right arm while he is busy washing the left arm, or wiping the head, and so on. He should go back to make good the part they doubted and the parts that follow it in that order.

The doubt could be about something else. For example, while he was busy washing the right arm, the person realized that he might not have washed it properly, i.e. from the elbow to the fingertips. Such doubt should be overruled, irrespective whether the doubt took place before embarking on the next step or before it.

If the doubt arose after finishing wudhu, one should not pay attention to it. The doubt might revolve around wiping the left foot, i.e. the last part of wudhu. The person should rectify it if the chain of steps of wudhu was still intact, or he has not engaged himself in some other business, such as drying his hands up, or embarking on prayer.

100. After finishing wudhu, a person harboured doubt as to whether or not he moved the ring in his finger to allow the water to reach the skin under it. In this case, he must start his wudhu afresh.

101. A person was not sure of the presence or otherwise of a mask of the sort which may prevent water from reaching the skin. That is, he did not know whether it was there before he started wudhu or after he had finished it. The wudhu is in order, if he was aware of the presence of the screen and took necessary action to remedy the situation it at the time. If this was not the case, he should perform new wudhu.

102. A person, with a second wudhu, performed prayer. After finishing prayer, he realized that the first wudhu was batil for this reason or the other. The second wudhu should do; accordingly, his prayer is in order. Moreover, he needs not perform a new wudhu for a subsequent prayer.

103. A person performed wudhu and said prayer. He then performed a second wudhu. He came to know that one of the two wudhus was batil because, he was, for example, certain that he did not wipe their head. He neither needs to repeat the prayer, nor perform a new wudhu for a forthcoming prayer.

104. A person had a wudhu and said prayer. He then broke his wudhu through hadath. He performed a new wudhu and said another prayer. He then realized that one of the two wudhus was batil. He should renew his wudhu and repeat whatever prayers he has said.

105. A person performed wudhu twice. He performed prayer thereafter. He then realized that he sustained a hadath; he could not tell when the hadath took place, i.e. after the first or the second wudhu. The prayer stands, if it was likely that he was aware of the hadath and its consequences at the time. It is obligatory though that he should perform a new wudhu for the next prayer.

106. On finishing wudhu, a person knew that he skipped a part thereof. He however does not know if the skipped part was among the wajib ones, such as wiping the head, or mustahab, e.g. rinsing the mouth. The wudhu stands.

107. A person was sure that he embarked on wudhu and performed a great part of it, such as washing the face and hands. However, due to unforeseen circumstances, which upset their concentration, he was not sure whether he finished the wudhu. Such wudhu is batil; he has to repeat it.

108. On finishing wudhu, a person was absolutely sure that he did not carry out certain steps of wudhu. For example, he wiped over the bandage in his foot instead of wiping the foot itself. However, he did not know whether what he has done is justified, such as in the case of wudhu of jabirah, or his action was brought about inadvertently. In either case, he has needs not worry as his wudhu stands.

Etiquette and Voluntary Acts of Wudhu

There are certain mustahab works and manners pertaining to wudhu. Should the worshippers feel the urge to do and uphold them, they will be rewarded. If not, they will not be punished.

109. Prior to embarking on wudhu, a person could wash his hands, rinse their mouth, and sniff water. Once he start with the original parts of wudhu, he may, if he so wish, wash his face and hands [from the elbow to the fingertips] twice. The second washing will be considered mustahab.

At the point of pouring water, it is mustahab to say, "Bismillahi wa Billah; Allahumuma Ij'ali Minat Tawwabeen, waj 'Alani Minal Mutatahhiireen". (In the name of Allah, O Lord! Make me among the repentant ones, and gather me together with those who wish to be tahir).
On finishing wudhu, you recite, "Alhamdu Lillahi Rabil 'Alameen". (May praise be to Allah, Lord of the Worlds).

Guidelines on Using the Toilet

As has already been discussed, Urine and faeces are among the things that invalidate wudhu. We are going to discuss the rules of conduct when using the toilet.

Hadith has it, "Whoever felt the need to use the toilet should be aware not sit facing the qiblah or turning their back to it".

There are some rules that have to be observed when urinating or passing stool.

110. One should cover his sexual parts from the gaze of adults, and those who have not attained adulthood, if they were looking to those parts in a dubious way.

Women can look at the sexual parts of their counterparts, if there was a need for it, such as medical examination.

Women are free not to cover their genitals from their spouse and vice versa. Genitals here mean the posterior and anterior. However, covering the sexual parts from the gaze of adults, and those who have not attained adulthood, is obligatory at all time, except in emergencies.

111. Famous jurists agree on the total ban of sitting, during passing urine or stool, with one's front side or back pointing to the direction of qiblah. The only exceptions are situations of difficulty or potential damage. However, it is most evident (al adhhar) that there should be no prohibition. but there is no harm in upholding it on the basis of ihityat.

112. Removing the najasah from the place and rendering it tahir.

113. The place through which urine has passed should be made tahir on contact with abundant water. If water was little, two washes must be performed; one for removing the najasah. Should the najasah disappear, it is evident that one wash would do. Should the water be kept running to the tune of two washes or more, it is apparent that one wash is sufficient. That said, in all the cases, washing more than once is more preferable as a matter of ihityat.

However, no fluid, other than water, can do the job.

114. Should faeces go beyond the immediate area of the anus, water should be used for cleansing. If this was not the case, the person is free to use either water or any other means, such as toilet paper or stones. Yet, water remains superior to any other object of cleansing.

We have to stress though that if excrement was laced with something else, e.g. blood which could have made the anus and the area around it najis, it is obligatory to use water alone to restore taharah to the place.

115. Should there be no alternative to cleansing with stones and the like, these should be tahir and more than one, if need be, three have to be used, as a matter of ihityat.

There is no harm if, after the najasah has been removed by any means, there remains either smell or colour.
116. It is not permissible to use other people's property to pass urine or stool, unless with their permission, be it explicit or implicit. Neither is it permissible for someone, other than the students, to use schools' toilet, especially if it was known that they are there for the exclusive use of students and staff.

117. One should not be mindful to avoid coming into contact with the water which has been used for cleansing the organs after passing urine or stool. Nevertheless, there are some restrictions, in that the used water should not have undergone any change, such as colour and smell; the najasah should not have spread to areas other than the passage points; it should not have polluted other areas in an extraordinary way; the used water should not carry any trace of najasah.

However, this used water is not good enough to either remove khabath or eliminate hadath.

118. After they have passed urine, it is mustahab for men to ensure that no more urine is left in the urethra. This called istibra' in Arabic.

This could be achieved by wiping, three times, over the area from the anus up to the root of the penis. By placing the thumb over the penis and the index finger below it, it should be pulled up to the glance three times, and jerked three times.

119. The advantage of this is to ensure that wetness [other than semen] that may have passed through the penis be considered tahir, if the person has performed istibra'.

This is unlikely when the person has not, in that an wetness that may be detected is treated as urine, which renders the place najis and consequently invalidate wudu.

If women detect any wetness and they doubt whether it is urine or any other fluid that is not najis, it should be deemed tahir, unless they are certain that it is urine.
Chapter Two:

Ghusl (Ceremonial Bathing)

Foreword

1. By ghusl we mean washing the whole body, from the summit of the head to the tiptoes. The manner in which ghusl should be conducted will follow. Ghusl could be mustahab or wajib.

The wajib is divided into two categories. Wajib for itself, such as the ghusl of the dead. It derives its being compulsory not for anything else, but for its being wajib.

The second one is wajib for being a precursor to another obligation, such as the ghusl of janabah, which becomes wajib when prayer becomes due. There are various types of this category. Ghusls of janabah, haydh, istihadhah, nifas, coming into contact with a dead body. By adding ghusl of the dead to the ones we have just mentioned, we will have six obligatory ghusls.
Mustahab ghusls are numerous. They have their own time and place. It suffices to mention two of these; the ghusl on Fridays and that for assuming ihram for umrah or hajj.

Ghusls, whether wajib or mustahab, are acts of worship like wudhu. So, none shall be deemed proper unless it is coupled with the niyyah of qurbah. Such will be acknowledged as taharah and cleaning.

2. Any ghusl, falling outside the pale of the injunctions of shari’a, shall neither be deemed an act of worship nor taharah. Thus, it has no worth in religion. Accordingly, should a person opt for performing ghusl outside what Allah, the Exalted, has ordained as wajib or mustahab, shall not be considered of any effect. As such, ghusl is different in this regard from wudhu. As has already been discussed, wudhu is a devotion and is called for in itself at all times and places because it is mustahab. When a person performs wudhu with the niyyah of qurbah, the wudhu is accepted and he is deemed tahir.

Each of these five types of ghusl has been made wajib for a purpose, which the jurists call a major hadath. By giving it this name they wanted to differentiate it from things which render wudhu null and void, i.e. minor hadath. That is, wudhu is a kind of taharah from minor hadath whereas ghusl is a kind of taharah from major hadath.

3. Any act of worship, such as prayer, that calls for taharah from minor hadath, i.e. wudhu, should call for taharah from major hadath, as has already been discussed in para.(71).
4. There are certain things that bar the worshipper, experiencing a minor hadath, from resuming them until they perform wudhu. By the same token, those who have gone through a major hadath, are barred until they perform ghusl. So long as they remain in a state of najasah, they are not allowed to, for example, touch the writing of the Holy Qur'an as discussed in para (47).

However, there are other forbidden things because of some major hadath, such as janabah and haydh. These will be discussed under their respective headings.

5. If a person experiences both the hadaths, i.e. minor, which makes it necessary to perform wudhu, and major that requires them to perform ghusl, performing ghusl will suffice for both of them. That is he needs not perform wudhu. The same goes for performing mustahab ghusl, i.e. not precipitated by major hadath.

However, ghusl makes wudhu redundant in all the situations but one. It is the ghusl of istihadhah, the discussion on which will follow, where in certain situations, the woman in question has to perform wudhu in addition to ghusl.

6. The reasons for ghusl may be more than one, such as a man experiencing janabah and touching a dead body, or a married woman just becoming tahir from haydh to experience janabah. One ghusl should suffice.

How should one go about performing ghusl?

7. All the five types of ghusl that is obligatory for itself and all mustahab ghusls should be carried out in the same way.
However, ghusl of the dead is different. This will be discussed under its respective heading.

Requirements

Ghusl is a means of restoring taharah to the human body, using water.

8. It is important that the water intended for ghusl should satisfy certain conditions. These are the same as the ones required for the water used for wudhu. That is, it should be pure, tahir and free. Thus, all what has been discussed in paras.(2) to (6) of the Chapter on Wudhu is relevant here.

9. The conditions which the worshipper should satisfy are (a) they should ensure that the parts of body which came into contact with najasah must be made tahir again, (b) they should be in good health, lest ghusl should aggravate their poorly state of health, and (c) the niyyah of qurbah should be present.

All this has been discussed in para (7) of the Chapter on Wudhu. One of the requirements the worshipper, performing wudhu, has to observe is that the place where they wipe their feet should be free as a matter of voluntary ihtiyat. As there is no wiping in ghusl, there is not such a condition. However, all that was discussed in (8) to (12) of the conditions, including niyyah, to be fulfilled by a worshipper performing wudhu is of relevance here.

In para (13) of Wudhu, it was stressed that the person should perform wudhu himself. Here, in ghusl, it is incumbent on them to perform it themselves too.
The Manner of Ghusl

According to shari'a, ghusl can be performed in two ways:

10. The step-by-step way which involves pouring water over the head and neck and washing them thoroughly. Next should come the rest of body. You are free to start with the right or left hand sides; should you so choose, you may pour water on both the parts in one go. No matter which way you opt for, you should ensure that you cover all parts of the body, including hair, washing each of which thoroughly.

As a matter of voluntary ihtiyat, you should include the neck, after it has been washed with the head once, with the rest of the body. It is apparent, however, that you should not worry about the step-by-step washing, if it was possible to wash the entirety of the body, head and neck included, in one go under, say, a water fall. This is because what is of consequence according to shari'a is that the rest of the body should not be washed before the head, rather the head should come first.

However, without the niyyah, it is not sufficient to turn that part of the body in the water, as such movement is not considered part of the washing.

11. The second type of ghusl is by dipping the whole body in water, irrespective whether the quantity of water was kurr or less; what is important though is that water must cover fully all parts of the body. Should the body hair be dense, you should ensure to run your hand through it to ascertain that water would reach the scalp once you are inside the water. Any part of the body which remains outside the water must be washed instantly. The niyyah should be made at the start of the process of submerging the body. However, it should also be sufficient, if it was made prior to getting into the water so long as it is maintained.

12. In both ways of ghusl, hair should be washed, be it dense or thin, making sure the skin it covers is washed. However, it is not wajib to wash the inside of, say, the nostrils or the hidden parts of the lips. In the event of doubt whether a particular part of the body is of the upper or hyper derma, you need not worry about washing it. That is, unless you were pretty sure that it was of the skin, then you have the doubt that it somehow had changed to be part of the hyper derma.

13. The step by step ghusl is more superior than immersing the whole body in water. However, the person is free to change their mind and perform the step by step method instead of the other one.

Occurrences Precipitating Wudhu while Performing Ghusl

14. Someone may feel the need to, say, urinate while performing any of the five types of obligatory ghusl. What should they do?

A. They should go ahead with ghusl which should be deemed in order. However, such ghusl cannot substitute wudhu, i.e. they should perform wudhu, even though repeating ghusl and wudhu is recommended, as a matter of voluntary ihtiyat.

Should the person opt for switching from the step-by-step ghusl to dipping the whole body in water, after they have experienced the hadath, they are free to do so. Such ghusl shall forgo the need for wudhu as the case maybe.

Occurrences Precipitating Ghusl While Performing Ghusl

15. In the process of performing ghusl, a person did something that required them to perform ghusl. How should they go about it?

A. Should the ghusl be required as a result of doing the same thing that required the first ghusl, such as janabah, starting afresh is recommended as a matter of obligatory ihtiyat.

The need for a second ghusl may arise after committing an act that is different from that which brought about the first ghusl, in that they might be performing ghusl of janabah and touched a dead body. Here, they are free to finish the original ghusl with the same niyyah; this should, however, be on the premise that finishing the ghusl be alright. They should though repeat the ghusl, this time round, on the premise that it is called for by virtue of shari'a law. They could also call the first ghusl off and start a new one. Should they opt for submerging themselves in water, they are free to do niyyah for ghusl of janabah or touching a dead body or both, if the option was for the step by step type of ghusl.

Ghusl of Jabirah

16. In the Chapter of Wudhu, we discussed wudhu of jabirah which is made incumbent on the person suffering an injury or illness that needed a bandage of some sort on the parts of the body that should be washed in wudhu.

Here we are addressing the ghusl of jabirah.

a. If the person is nursing a cut or an ulceration, they can perform ghusl. However, it is sufficient to wash the area surrounding the place of the injury. They can also resort to tayammum.

b. If the person is having a splint secured to, say, the fractured limb, he can have a ghusl. It is sufficient that he wipes over the jabirah as though he was in the same position of a person, experiencing the same injury, but performing wudhu.

c. The person having a fracture but not wearing a splint should take to taymum; it is not sufficient that he performs incomplete ghusl.

This should be the norm, if ghusl in an appropriate way was not feasible. However, if it was, and without difficulty or endangering one's health, conducting proper ghusl should be the basis.

How should one go about doubt in ghusl?

17. If ghusl became necessary and the worshipper was not sure whether he performed ghusl or not, it is wajib that he should perform ghusl. In another situation, the person knew that he had entered the bathroom to perform ghusl for, say, janabah; after he had gone out, he had a lingering doubt as to whether or not he had performed ghusl. In this case, he should perform ghusl as though he was still in a state of janabah.

18. In the process of performing ghusl or shortly after it, the person started doubting that he did not do ghusl properly, in that he did not pour water on the head and neck first, rather he washed them as part of the whole body. Such ghusl should be deemed in order, so long as he feels that he washed their body all in one go, for what is required is that one should not start washing the body before the head.

19. A person opted for the step-by-step ghusl. After finishing, he realized that he did not wash one part of his body. What should he do?

A. Should that part be the head, the neck, or part thereof, it is obligatory that he washes it and repeat the ghusl. If the missed part was elsewhere in the body, such as a hand or a foot, washing it alone should do.

20. After having ghusl, a person had doubted whether he observed the order of parts when washing. What should he do?

A. He should consider the ghusl in order.

21. Should the doubt arise from whether the person washed the whole of the head and neck or part thereof, he should assume that the ghusl was in order.

The same ruling applies in the case where the person is in the next stage of washing, i.e. washing the body, after having finished with the head and neck. They should carry on and finish off what he started with.

However, if the doubt centred around washing or not washing the head and neck, or part thereof, before going to the next stage of washing the body, it is obligatory that he washes the parts in doubt.

22. Should the person, in the process of washing the body, doubt whether he washed an arm or some other part, it is obligatory on him to resume washing the suspected part. This is irrespective of whether the doubt arose after taking bath or during it. Whether the part in doubt was on the left or right sides of the body is also immaterial.

23. Should the doubt revolve around the correctness, or otherwise, of the washing, such as the person might have thought that he used najis or mixed water in performing the ghusl, he should assume that the ghusl was in order. There will be no need to repeat it. It is immaterial if the doubt took place during or after the ghusl; neither does it matter at what stage of washing process the doubt crept in.

1. Ghusl of Janabah and its Rules

How does janabah come about?

Janabah is an abstract thing. It occurs due to ejaculation of semen or sexual intercourse. Being in a state of janabah is true of males and females.

Secreting Semen

24. Passing semen through the penis, be it during sleep or awake, wilfully or forcibly, during sexual union or otherwise, requires ghul. Whether the quantity passed is little or large is immaterial.

25. Liquids, which may or may not be semen, could be passed by the male organ. How should they be treated?

A. There is a number of issues which need addressing: (a) The semen should be passed with pleasure, (b) thrown out suddenly and with force, and (c) the body should experience relaxation after its passing. Should the liquid passed lack any of these characteristics, there is no way it can be semen, provided that the person is healthy.

As for the semen passed by a sick person, it suffices to consider it thus, even if it lacked the force when it was passed, i.e. (b) above. Should one description of the remaining two be absent, no consequential effect of the kind normally associated with the passing of semen should be considered.

26. Q. A person performed ghul for yanabah. Upon finishing he could still trace some sort of liquid coming out of his male organ. He could not tell whether or not it is semen. Does he have to perform ghul again?

A. If the person passed urine prior to the ghul, such ghul is in order. Otherwise, the wetness should be treated as semen, and accordingly, he has to repeat the ghul.

The person had performed ghul before passing urine, then passed urine. They had slight doubt that their urine might be laced with semen. In such a case, he needs not worry.

27. Q. A person noticed a sort of wetness, he could not tell whether it was semen or urine. What should he do?
A. If, prior to presence of the wetness, the person was in state of taharah, without having had wudhu or ghusl, it obligatory that he should perform both.

Should he be obliged to perform wudhu for something he did, he should perform wudhu and not ghusl.

Should he find himself obliged to perform ghusl for some act he commissioned, he has to perform ghusl and need not worry about wudhu.

Sexual Union

28. We have already mentioned that janabah comes about due to secreting semen either through sexual intercourse or any other way.

What we are addressing here is sexual intercourse. Sexual union comes about as a result of inserting the penis in the woman's vagina, regardless of the level of penetration, i.e. be it full or partial, and whether there has been ejaculation or not. Should this be the case, both parties enter into a state of janabah, and must therefore have ghusl. Whether the parties to the sexual act were sane or insane, willing or coerced is immaterial.

29. The man is free to get engaged in wedlock sex, even if he knew he was not going to be able to perform ghusl and should therefore take to tayammum to say prayer. Whether he embarked on the sexual act before or after the time of prayer had become due is immaterial too.
Is it necessary to have ghūsl?

Ghūsl of janabah is a devotion in itself. Notwithstanding, it becomes obligatory as a precursor to other acts of worship. Such shall not be deemed sound, unless ghūsl is performed. Accordingly, acceptance of the five daily prayers is dependant on having a ghūsl. That is, irrespective of whether the prayer in hand was said ada’ or qadha’. This is also true of any parts of prayer that might be said after the main prayer has been performed. Just as ghūsl is conditional to the acceptance of an obligatory prayer, so is it conditional in voluntary prayer because no prayer shall be considered valid without the person performing it being in a state of taharah. The same goes for tawaf of hajj and umrah, and their prayer.

However, like wudhu, ghūsl is not an essential requirement for saying prayer for the souls of the dead. Neither is it a condition for performing the two sujoods, usually performed after finishing prayer for certain commissions or omissions thereof (sajdatay-as-sahu). Nevertheless, being in a state of taharah when performing these two acts of worship is recommended as a matter of ihtiyat mustahab (voluntary precaution).

30. Unlike wudhu, ghūsl is essential for:

a. A voluntary tawaf, i.e. it is not required for tawaf itself, rather because a person in a state of janabah should not enter the Ka’ba, let alone performing tawaf there. However, should the person inadvertently enter The Holy Mosque and perform tawaf, it shall be in order.

b. Fasting during the month of Ramadhan or fasting qadha at other times of the year. The person in a state of janabāh should have a ghusl before dawn, as a matter of iḥtiyāt, for the acceptability of their fast. More details will be discussed in the chapter dedicated to fast. However, ghusl is not essential for voluntary fast, in that the person can remain in a state of janabah and wake up thus.

c. Iʿtiqaf, because a person in a state of janabah cannot take to this form of worship knowingly. However, should they unintentionally complete their iʿtikaf while still in a state of janabah, it should be in order.

More details on certain things which a person in a state of janabah cannot embark on until he becomes tahir again will follow.

What to do when in doubt?

31. Should a person in a state of janabah perform wudhu and say prayer without realizing he has to perform ghusl instead, his prayer is invalid. Accordingly, he should perform ghusl and repeat that prayer.

A person may experience the coming out of semen unconsciously, such as in a dream. Should semen come out and the person was not aware of it, he then performed wudhu and prayer, only to find out that he was in a state of janabah, he has to have ghusl and repeat his prayer.

32. A person may notice that either his clothes or body are stained with semen. If he has absolutely sure that the semen belongs to him and that he did not have ghusl for janabah, he should do so. he is not required to repeat any prayer that has been said and whose time has passed, if he thinks that he has performed it before the janabah. However, he has to say, by way of qad- ha, any prayer he has performed after he knew of the janabah.

Any prayer that was said on its appointed time and there was still time to repeat it, he should do so, unless the person was certain that it was before the time he experienced the janabah.

Things a person in a state of janabah should not do until he becomes tahir again

We have already mentioned that whatever makes ghusl incumbent on a person, he should abstain from touching the print of the Holy Qur'an, unless he becomes tahir again. However, it is not forbidden for him to touch the name of "Allah" and His attributes wherever he may be outside the Qur'anic text; neither is it forbidden for him to touch the names of the prophets and the imams (a.s.w.).

There are other things which are forbidden for a person in a state of janabah:

33. Reciting any of the four ayahs of sajdah. These are verses 15/as-Sajdah, 37/Fussilat, 62/an-Najm, and 19/al-Alaq. This should be applied as a matter of voluntary ihtiyat.

34. Staying at, and passing through, the two holy places, The Grand Mosque in Makkah and the Prophet's Mosque in Madinah.

35. Staying at any other mosque, except for the following:
   a. Where there are two gates for the mosque, where the person in a state of janabah can enter from one and exit from the other without staying.

b. Entering the mosque could be for taking away certain things which belong to the person, such as a book. There should be no staying at the mosque.

By comparison, the two prohibitions in (b) and (c) do not extend to al-Masjidil Haraam at Makkah and the Messenger's Mosque at Madinah; they are confined to other mosques.

36. Is it permissible for the person in a state of janabah to enter the holy shrines where the prophets and the imams are buried?

A. Apparently, it is permissible. However, it is, as a matter of ihtiyat, desirable to avoid entering these shrines.

37. The prohibition imposed on the person in a state of janabah not to enter mosques is a universal one, i.e. it covers all mosques be they fully operational or derelict all over the globe.

38. If someone is not sure whether a certain building or a place were part of the main building of the mosque, in that you could not describe it as mosque, does the rules governing the mosque extend to the suspect building?

A. Here, one should follow the practice of the people in whose area the mosque is found. If they were treating the building in question as a mosque, the rules concerning a mosque should apply. Otherwise, they do not.

39. Should the person in a state of janabah be unable to restore taharah to his body, they should not be employed in any lawful capacity which may entail staying in the mosque. However, should the employment contract be taken out with a person, in a state of janabah, who does not mind staying in the mosque, such contract is lawful. Should the hired person renge on his pledge to carry the work out because they were in a state of janabah, they have the right to do so. The employer though has the right to annul the contract.

40. The prohibitions imposed on a person in a state of janabah are confined to those who know of the state they are in. As for those who are not aware of such a state, or are doubtful, they practically are outside the remit of the prohibitions.

41. Generally speaking, all that has been discussed in paragraphs (10) to (13) of this Chapter applies to ghusl of janabah.

It is obligatory to hold niyyah of qurbah. There is no difference here whether the ghusl was to be performed to carry out a recommended devotion, such as touching the print of the Holy Qur'an, or an obligatory one, like prayer. It is advisable to refer to paragraph (77) of the Chapter on Wudhu.

42. A duly performed ghusl of janabah can be as good as any other ghusl, provided that the intention was confined to it.

Should a person not be in a position to determine whether he has to perform any of two ghusls, for example janabah or touching the dead, yet he performed ghusl intending it to be that which is incumbent on him to perform, the ghusl is in order.

However, should he be aware that he has to perform both the ghusls, yet he performed either one or both of them with the niyyah present, the ghusl is in order. If he performed the ghusl without the niyyah for either, the ghusl is batil.

2. Ghusl of Haydh

Types of Blood

43. Blood could come out from the female organ, in instances other than child birth. It is of several types:

a. The bleeding an adult woman experiences every month. It is called haydh blood. The woman concerned should perform ghusl to restore her taharah at the end of her menstrual cycle. The ghusl is described as that of haydh.

b. Some bleeding caused by an injury or disease in the womb, or that which normally found in the aftermath of surgery.

c. The blood resulting from rupturing the membrane of virginity.

d. Any other bleeding is called istihadha.

There are certain rules governing the woman experiencing haydh, among which is that she should stop praying, refrain from doing such things as staying in the mosque and stop having intimate sexual encounter with her husband.

As for the woman who is experiencing any of the second or third types of bleeding, she should become \textit{tahir} by washing the affected place with water where possible, i.e. without subjecting herself to any harm. That is, these two types of blood do not call for any \textit{ghusl} or \textit{wudhu}.

The blood of \textit{istihadhah} requires \textit{wudhu} or \textit{ghusl} in a manner which will be discussed in detail. The woman experiencing \textit{istihadhah} is obligated to uphold such a requirement and say her prayer, unlike the woman experiencing \textit{haydh}.

\textbf{Requirements of Haydh Blood}

For the blood to be considered that of \textit{haydh}, it should fulfill certain conditions:

44. a. The woman should have completed nine years of age and not exceeded fifty. Nine years is, as a matter of \textit{ihtiyat}, the legal age of adulthood; fifty is the age of menopause. As for the woman who cannot determine whether she has reached the age of menopause, she must conclude that she has not; accordingly, she must continue to conduct herself as though she is still having her monthly period, whenever or not she experiences it. As for the nine-year old, who experiences bleeding, she must treat it as \textit{haydh}, if she has completed nine years of age. If she was still undecided as to her true age, she should not consider it as such.

44. Continuity of bleeding during the first three days of the period is widely held as the norm. The first two nights and three days should complete the said three days. For example, if the woman's period starts early on Saturday, the continuous bleeding should take her to the sunset of Monday. However, if it starts at the midday or evening of Saturday, it should continue to the midday of Tuesday. Intermittent periods when the bleeding stops would not detract from the principle of continuity.

In our opinion, however, continuity of bleeding is not of consequence. Accordingly, prayer should be abandoned when the woman experiences bleeding and resumed at the intervals when the bleeding stops, and so on until the three-day duration is complete. This is so, if the woman was, at the outset, in a position to tell that bleeding would continue for three days.

That said, in the case of non-continuity, it is desirable, as a matter of ihtiyat wujubi, to combine that which a woman in a state of istihadha is required to do and what a woman in haydh is not required to do.

45. b. The bleeding should not continue for a period in excess of ten days. If it does, the whole period should not be considered as haydh. Some of it might be treated as haydh as will be discussed. This is so because from a shari'a point of view haydh does not exceed ten days in total.

46. c. The woman should have had at least ten days of a state of taharah before the start of a new menstrual cycle. So, if she had experienced a monthly period then became tahir only to experience another bout of bleeding in, say, nine days time, the new blood would not count as haydh; this is so because the period of taharah intervening any two intervals of haydh should not be less than ten days, as a matter of shari'a law.

What we mean by ten days is the period consisting of ten days and the nine nights falling between the first day and the last one. By taharah we mean that the woman is free from haydh blood, regardless whether she was completely free from blood or experiencing istihadhah blood.

47. For the woman to fall under the banner of a woman experiencing haydh according to the preceding description, the blood should come out from the female organ. If the blood remained inside, it would not fit the description of haydh blood, no matter how long it remained trapped. If at the outset it came out, it is sufficient to be treated as haydh blood, although some of it may still be trapped inside.

How can a woman recognize haydh blood?

There might be few case where the woman cannot determine whether the bleeding she is experiencing is that of haydh.

48. a. The doubt may be based on the possibility of the blood being that which is resulting from an internal injury or ulceration, i.e. the second category. Should this be the case, she should treat it as that of the second category. Accordingly, she should not worry about satisfying the requirements of haydh or istihadha.

49. b. The uncertainty may arise from the belief that the blood could be that which has resulted from rupturing the membrane of virginity, i.e. the third category. If this was the case, the women could check the situation by inserting a piece of cotton in her genitals. After a short while, she should extract it. If the blood formed some sort of a ring like shape on the piece of cotton, the blood should be that of the virginity membrane. If the piece of cotton was soaked with blood, it should be that of haydh.

Should the woman choose not to apply this investigation, and carry on with any act of worship, such as prayer or fast, such a worship is batil, until she is pretty sure that she has become tahir from haydh again.

However, if investigating by using a piece of cotton was not feasible for any reason, the woman should act in the light of her experience of haydh and non-haydh periods. If she is a novice, or she could not count on her experience in this regard, she must treat the blood as that of virginity.

50. c. Should the bleeding instance be neither that of an injury/ulceration, nor virginity, yet the woman cannot determine whether it is that of haydh or istihadha, she can resort to one of the following two methods:

1. Where possible, she should resort to applying ihtiyat, in that she should not embark on the kind of things a woman in haydh usually refrain from, and do the things which a woman in istihadha is required to do, such as wudhu, ghusl, and prayer until such time comes when the bleeding stops. Wherever we mention ihtiyat with regard to women we mean the aforesaid one.

2. She could resort to applying one of two legal ways of determining whether the bleeding she is experiencing is that of haydh:
a. Verifying it by way of its characteristics, or
b. Confirming it on the basis of past experience of the menstrual cycle.

Verification by Characteristics

51. Haydh blood has certain characteristics which set it aside. It is often either dark or red, warm, and comes out gushing. Istihadhah blood is in the main void of such characteristics. It is yellow in colour.

Allah, the Most High, has characterized the haydh blood as such to make it distinctly and readily known as that of haydh, so that whenever the woman experiences it, be it during her menstrual cycle or during other days, she should treat it as haydh blood.

However, she should keep an eye on the bleeding for three days from the time she first saw the blood. If it continued, provided that it has the characteristics of haydh blood for the three-day period, she can conclude that it is that of haydh; she should therefore abide by the "dos and don'ts" required by shari'a law. This is so irrespective of whether or not the blood retained the characteristics of haydh blood or turned into yellow in colour.

The blood may stop or lose any of the characteristics of haydh blood before the three-day period. If this was the case, it goes without saying that it is not haydh blood; rather an istihadhah one. Accordingly, it is obligatory on the woman to take to the procedure required by that of a woman in isti-hadhah, in that she should carry out all acts of worship, she abstained from during that period, by way qadha.

Verification by Past Experience

52. Should the blood not bear the characteristics of that of haydh, such as it was yellow, the woman should resort to applying the yardstick of her known menstrual cycle, she should conclude that it is that of haydh. Likewise, if such blood appears before one or two days of the time of her monthly period. Should it appear outside the days thus described, she should conclude that the blood is that of istihadhah.

However, the woman must not lose sight of the fact that she should observe the blood for three days as has already been discussed, and act accordingly.

For the woman to rely on her past experience insofar as her monthly period is concerned to determine the nature of bleeding, she must be in a position to tell when her period usually starts. If she has a regular period, yet she forgot when it would start, what should she do?

A. If the blood has the characteristics of haydh blood, she should consider herself having haydh in the light of the first premise (verification by characteristics). Should the blood not contain the characteristics of haydh blood, she should consider herself as having istihadhah so long as she was not aware of the date of her period.

A woman experienced bleeding, not bearing the characteristics of haydh blood, believing that it would continue for, say, a week or more than the duration of her period. It so happened that she was aware that the time for her period was either in the first half or the second half of the week. If this was the case, she should resort to applying ihтиyat throughout the duration. Thus, she should uphold the prohibitions imposed on a woman in haydha and do that which a woman in istihadhah is required to do. However, we will discuss in some detail the rules governing the woman who has forgotten the time of her monthly period.

53. How does the menstrual cycle happen?

A. It materializes when the woman sees haydha blood at a certain time of the month and sees it again at the same time of the following month. It also comes about at regular intervals, such as a woman experiencing haydha at intervals of half a month separating one menstrual cycle from the other.

If the woman gets used to seeing the blood at the beginning of every lunar calendar month for, say, five days, does it follow that ascertaining that it is a haydha blood should be based on it appearing at the start of the month and continuing for five days?

A. No, it suffices that it should appear within that period, in that if a blood that is yellow in colour appears on the second day of the said period and continues till the fifth day, it should be considered haydha.

A woman's period follows a certain pattern, in that she notices the blood at the start of every month. Sometimes it continues for three days or more. Which of the days, she experiences the yellow blood, should be considered that of haydha?

A. The first three days of the month.

Verification of Hayd by Characteristics and Past Experience

54. During her menstrual cycle, the woman may experience bleeding that is yellow in colour. It may continue after the lapse of the days of period. That which continued have the characteristics of haydh blood. Should such blood fulfill the requirements of haydh blood be present, all the blood be considered haydh blood, although some of it fits the description of menstrual cycle and some the characteristics.

However, if red blood appears few days before the time of menstrual cycle continues to its due time, all the blood should be treated as haydh blood, in accordance with the preceding general guidelines.

To sum up, any blood which cannot be judged as that of haydh or istihadhah should be treated as that of haydh, provided that it fulfills the conditions mentioned in any of the two principles previously discussed, i.e. the blood may have the characteristics of haydh blood, or its appearance may coincide with the time of the menstrual cycle or slightly ahead of it. Otherwise, it should be deemed istihadhah.

The Monthly Period May not be Determined on the Basis of Characteristics

55. If haydh recur two consecutive times at the beginning of the month, it should be treated as such, i.e. haydh blood. The woman should treat the blood that appears after that particular time as haydh, albeit it is yellow, as has already been discussed.

However, the same situation may be experienced by the woman with the exception that she is not sure that it is haydh; nevertheless, it has the properties of haydh blood; so she treated it as such. At the same time of the third month, she saw yellow blood, that did not fit the description of haydh blood. How should the woman in question go about treating such instances?

A. She should act as though she has a regular period.

The Pregnant Woman and the Period

56. What we have discussed applies to a non-pregnant woman. As for a pregnant woman, juristic opinion is divided as to her experiencing both the pregnancy and having a period at the same time.

However, what we are inclined to is that the two cannot coincide. Yet, the woman in question should not abandon ih-tiyat, if she comes to see blood during the time of her monthly period, or if the said blood bears the characteristics of haydh blood, particularly when it appears after the monthly period in twenty days. She should uphold the prohibitions imposed on a woman in haydh, and the commissioning of the acts required by a woman in istihadhah.

When should the woman in haydh perform ghusl?

57. Should there be any possibility within ten days from the start of the period that bleeding stopped, the woman should hasten to ascertain the extent of the stoppage. If she is sure that her period came to an end, she should perform ghusl. Conversely, three situations may arise:

a. The woman may have a regular and definite period; the bleeding would not exceed the duration of her period; she would be deemed in a state of hayd so long as there is blood after checking.

b. The woman may not have a definite period, in that once her hayd may take seven days and another eight. Such a woman should consider herself in a state of hayd if there are traces of blood after checking; that is, within the ten-day duration of hayd. This is so if the traceable blood has the properties of hayd blood. If not, it is istihadhah blood.

c. The woman may have a regular definite period of, say, a week. Upon checking she finds that there is still blood, after one week and prior to the ten-day duration. If she was in a state of istihadhah before the start of her period, and the istihadhah blood continued to the time of hayd, she should end her hayd by the end of her known period; she must deem whatever blood that is left as that of istihadhah.

Should she be tahir before the onset of her period, it is left to her discretion. If she is pretty sure that bleeding would continue and exceed the ten-day duration, she must end her hayd by the end of her known period and consider the remaining days as istihadhah.

If she is hoping that bleeding would stop before the end of the ten-day duration, she must add one day at least to the duration of her known period, thus considering herself in hayd, and carry out her obligations as though she is in a state of istihadhah. She is allowed to add two days or all the days that complete the ten-day duration to the days of her period and continue discharging her obligations as though she is in a state of hayd for the entire duration.
If upon checking within the ten-day duration, the woman found out that there was no more blood, yet she was not absolutely certain that it was not the end of bleeding, in that it might reappear within the ten-day duration, what should she do?

A. If she was sure that bleeding would resume, she must not pay attention to the interval. Accordingly, she must act as though bleeding did not stop. If she was not sure of the reappearance of blood, she must perform ghusl and pray. Should bleeding not resume within the ten-day duration, her actions are in order; if not, she must act as though she was still in hayd during the entire duration.

For example, a woman experienced bleeding for four days. She became tahir, thus performing ghusl and resuming her acts of worship for two days. She then experienced bleeding for three days. She must treat the entire period of nine days as though she was in hayd. As a result, whatever religious duties she discharged during the fifth and sixth days are not in order.

This is what jurists meant when they have ruled that the interval of taharah falling between two periods of bleeding is considered an integral part of hayd, if the whole period does not exceed ten days.

Checking for the stoppage of bleeding or not by using a piece of cotton or by any other way, is obligatory on every woman who thinks that her period may have stopped. Should a woman take to ghusl, without making sure that the bleeding had stopped, in the belief that it did, such a ghusl is not in order, unless it was proven that she really was free from blood when she had ghusl. However, if she was absolutely certain of her being free from blood, without checking, it is not obligatory on her to resort to checking; thus, she may have ghusl and take to prayer.

What if blood exceeds the ten-day duration?

As has already been discussed that if the flow of blood stops before the lapse of three days, it should be deemed istihadha blood. This is so because the minimum duration of a menstrual cycle is three days.

However, should the flow of blood continue for more than ten days, which is the maximum duration of a menstrual cycle, it follows that some of that blood is not that of haydh. In other words, the blood in question could have started as haydh blood, yet it turned into that of istihadhah. The question is: How would the woman pinpoint when the change took place, i.e. is it from the point the blood flow going beyond the ten-day duration or earlier than that?

Assuming that the change took place after the lapse of the said duration, the woman ceased all acts of worship during this period. And on the second assumption that the change happened prior to the expiry of the ten-day period, she must resume, by way of qadha, all acts of worship for the duration she missed. How could she reconcile the situation?

A. The situation varies according to the type of monthly period of the woman. Thus, there are five different categories:

58. a. A woman with a monthly period that is specific in terms of the date it starts and the number of days it lasts.
Upon experiencing the flow of blood, such a woman should conclude that the blood is that of haydh. Should it exceed ten days, she should treat the days of her period as haydh, even if the characteristics of the blood were not of haydh blood; the excess is istihadhah, even if it fits the definition of haydh blood. She must apply the same measure, if the flow of blood starts prematurely or after the date of her period, provided that its duration is more than ten days.

Accordingly, she must treat the blood appearing during her known days as haydh and the remainder istihadhah. She should then take to any acts of worship, by way of qadha, that she abandoned during that period.

Should the period start at a different date and continue for more than ten days, the woman must treat as haydh a number of days equivalent to her normal menstrual cycle. The remainder should be treated as istihadhah.

What if the woman does not complete her menstrual cycle in time?

59. Suppose that a woman's haydh starts at the beginning of the month and continues for a week. She experienced the flow of blood on the fourth day and continued for two weeks. How should she go about calculating the duration of haydh? Would she treat the blood that she experienced during her usual time of haydh, i.e. four days which are the fourth, the fifth, the sixth, and the seventh of the month, or should she resort to considering the period from the fourth until the tenth so that it does coincide with the number of days during which she usually have her period?

A. The woman in question should perform, by way of qadha, all acts of worship she abandoned during the days which fell outside the days of her usual period.

Take the same woman in the previous example. Suppose this time her haydh started a week earlier than usual. The flow of blood continued until the fifth of the month. Would she consider the duration of her haydh that which falls within her usual period, i.e. five days from the first to the fifth, or should she add two more days from the previous days to the five days to remedy the shortfall to complete a week?

A. Here, the woman is not required to perform any acts of worship she abandoned during some of the days, i.e. those which she added to the five days to make up for the shortfall. However, it is more likely that she should compensate any acts of worship during the days, that fall outside her usual period days, she missed. She is not allowed to complete the week by adding any days falling outside her known days of haydh.

60. b. Some women may have their period during a fixed term but not necessarily at the same time every month.

Any woman in this category, should treat the flow of blood as haydh, if it has the properties of that of haydh. If the flow of blood continues beyond ten days, she must consider only those days that are equivalent to the number of days during which she usually have her period, starting with the onset of the flow of blood; the remainder should be deemed istihadhah.
61. c. Some women may have their period during a fixed time but not necessarily for the same number of days every month.

Any woman in this category may treat as _haydh_ blood any blood that fits the properties of that of _haydh_; she may consider that the flow of blood started at the usual menstrual cycle. If she experienced any flow of blood that continued more than ten days, she has the choice to treat as _haydh_ six or seven days of the whole duration; the remainder should be treated as _istihadhah_.

What if the woman forgets the time of her period?

The ruling in the case of such a woman varies in line with the category of her period as has already been discussed in the preceding paragraphs.

a. The woman who has a fixed term period could forget how many days her period usually lasts. Such a woman should be guided by the type of blood that is appearing during her menstrual cycle. That which fits the definition of _haydh_ blood should be treated as such, and that which is not, should be deemed as _istihadhah_, provided that the whole duration of blood flow does not exceed ten days. If it does, she should resort to guess work; should she be inclined to consider the duration of her period five days, for example, she should stick to those days.

Should she think that the duration is more than seven days, it is obligatory on her to observe the prohibitions imposed on a woman in _haydh_, and the obligations required to be discharged by a woman in instihadhah insofar as the number of days in excess of seven days is concerned. This is so up to and including a duration of ten days. The rest should be deemed istihadhah.

For example, haydh may set in on the first of the month and continue for more than ten days to cease on the thirteenth. If she believes that her period is nine days, it is obligatory on her to treat seven of those days as haydh, apply ihtiyat for the two days ending with the ninth, and consider herself experiencing istihadha for the period of the tenth to the thirteenth.

b. The woman who has her period on a particular date every month, but with irregular number of days each time, may forget the date of her period. If she experiences any flow of blood for at least three days and not more than ten days, she should treat the blood that carries the properties of haydh as such, and that which does not as istihadhah.

If the duration of the menstrual cycle exceeds ten days, there may arise two scenarios:

b.1. Assume that the woman is aware that her monthly period has fallen within these thirteen days without being able to determine when. In such a case, it is obligatory on her to do what a woman in istihadha is required to do and refrain from that which a woman in haydh is prohibited to do during those thirteen days, regardless of whether the type of blood was that of haydh or istihadhah.

b.2. Assume that the woman does not know that her monthly period falls within these thirteen days. In this case, she must consider the blood that fits the description of haydh blood as haydَh, provided that it is not more than ten days and not less than three. The blood which falls under the banner of istihadhah must be treated as such.

Should all the blood be of the same type, such as that of haydَh, she must observe six or seven days of it as haydَh and the rest istihadhah. If the blood is that which fits the definition of istihadhah blood, all of it should be treated as istihadhah.

c. The woman who has a fixed term/date period may be prone to forgetting how many days her period usually lasts or this occurrence or that. For such a case there could be three different situations:

c. 1. She may forget the duration of her period but not the time. The ruling in this case is identical to that of a woman with a fixed date period. However, once such a woman experiences the blood flow, which must be of haydَh type, for more than ten days, and since she is not sure whether her period days fall within this flow, she must treat the number of days of her period as haydَh and the rest istihadhah.

   c. 2. She may forget the time of her period but not the duration. Such should assume the state of haydَh as soon as she experiences the blood flow, even if it is not bearing the characteristics of haydَh blood. She must do this for three days. Treatment of the period in access of three days must be determined by the type of blood, i.e. whether it is that of haydَh or istihadhah. If it is haydَh blood, she must treat it as such for up to ten days. If not, she must consider it as istihadhah.

Should the blood flow exceed ten days, the ruling in this case is that of a woman with a fixed term period which has al-

c.3. Some women may forget both the time and duration of their period. A woman in such a situation must resolve it by reference to the previous two cases. That is, she should do what a woman in istihadha is required to do and not embark on that which a woman in haydh is prohibited from, even if she can have a guess as to the number of days of her period; this is so because giving more weight to the time factor is more important than that of the duration and so on.

62. d. The woman may have an irregular period, both in duration and time. She must resolve her situation by treating the onset of blood as haydh so long as it exhibits the characteristics of haydh blood. Should her period continue for more than ten days, there may be two possible situations:

d. 1. The blood type and colour could be that of haydh throughout the period. If this is so, she could treat the duration at the onset of the blood flow as haydh up to six or seven days, as she deems fit. The remaining duration should be considered istihadhah.

d. 2. Both the blood type and colour could be changing. If this has been the case, the woman should treat the blood which is more akin to the characteristics as haydh; the exceptions being that:

   d/2/a. The duration of the blood in question be less than three days. The ruling on such a case is the same as in (d/1).

   d/2/b. The duration of the blood under discussion be more than ten days. The ruling on such a case is that discussed para (d/1).

   d/2/c. There may be two separate durations of the blood in question. These are separated by a duration where the blood takes a different hue. The total of the two durations may not exceed ten days. However, if the intervening duration is added to the total, it is bound to increase to more than ten days. Suppose that the total duration was fifteen days divided into three equal segments; in such a case, the woman should treat the first five days as haydh, the second five-day duration as istihadhah, and so does the third, for it has followed on from the ten-day period.

63. e. The Beginner, i.e. the woman who witnesses the blood flow for the first time. She may treat the blood bearing the characteristics of haydh as haydh blood as has already been discussed. However, should the period exceed ten days, there may be two possible situations, like those of a woman with an irregular period:

   e. 1. Should the blood be that of the type of haydh, she may mimic the menstrual cycle of her women folk, i.e. go for the same number of days of their period and treat the rest as istihadhah. If the monthly period of her relatives was not universal or if she did not have relatives, she should treat six or seven days of her first experience of a period as haydh; she must observe ihtiyat for the remaining three or four days that complete the ten-day duration; that is, she must abstain from any acts of worship which a woman in haydh is not supposed to embark on, and uphold those acts a woman in istihadhah is required to do.

   Second time round, she must treat the first three days of the blood flow as haydh, and observe ihtiyat for the remaining six or seven days.
e. 2. Both the blood type and colour could be changing. If this has been the case, the woman should treat the blood which is more akin to the characteristics of *haydح blood as *haydح; that said, she should note the exceptions in the case of a woman with an irregular period already discussed.

Should bleeding continue for more than ten days, it could be one of two types

64. The blood in excess of ten days, which is governed by the aforesaid rules, should have the following properties:

a. The blood flow must continue for ten days until the eleventh day.

b. The blood flow could be intermittent, in that it appears for a while then stops, but before the lull duration continues for ten days, it resumes again.

If the stoppage duration be ten days, both the durations [the one preceding the intervening duration and that which follows it] should be treated as *haydح as has already been discussed. That is, the rules governing the flow of blood for more than ten days do not apply.

65. Summation

The following ten cases may help the woman in identifying the appropriate ruling applicable to her own case:

a. Any woman may experience *haydح blood for three to ten days. It may then stop for ten days only to resume for another three to ten days. The two durations of blood flow are deemed *haydح; the intervening duration is one of *taharah.
b. A woman experiencing an intermittent flow of haydh blood, within a ten-day period, i.e. that which appears for three days, then stops for a short spell only to resume again, should treat all the blood during this time, including the short breaks, as haydh.

c. A woman experiencing a flow of haydh blood for a period of less than three days, only to resume after a day, two, or more, should treat all as haydh blood.

d. A woman experiencing a flow of haydh blood for a period of three days or more, which changes in colour to yellow for several days only to return in the form of haydh blood, may treat such blood as haydh, provided the entire duration does not exceed ten days.

e. A woman, but not one with an irregular period, experiencing a flow of blood, that is yellow in colour, should treat such blood as istihadhah and not haydh. The same goes for a woman with a fixed term monthly period, even though the flow of blood may continue throughout the days of her period.

A woman with a specific date of period, should treat the yellow blood appearing outside the days of her period as isti-hadhah. That which appears during her days of period should be treated as haydh.

f. A woman may experience the appearance of yellow blood which later turns into haydh blood and continues for at least three days. Such a woman should consider herself having istihadah on the days of undue menses and having haydh in those days when the blood flow is that of haydh.

g. A woman with a fixed term/date menstrual period may experience a flow of blood during the time of her period; yet it may stop before the completion of the duration of the period. Suppose this woman's period starts at the beginning of the month and continues for a week. If she has her period for, say, five days only to stop another five days and resume for seven days, can she deem the latter duration, of seven days, her monthly period because it tallied with the number of days of her actual period?

A. No, she must consider the blood of the first duration of five days that of *hayd*h, although it is yellow in colour and the blood flow during the seven days istihadhah, although it exhibits the characteristics of *hayd*h blood.

h. A woman with a fixed date menstrual period may experience the flow of blood prematurely. Suppose it starts three days or more earlier and continues during the days of period and beyond. Should the total duration be not more than ten days, there is no doubt that it should be considered *hayd*h as early as two days prior to the date of period, regardless of whether it was red or yellow in colour. Prior to this, the blood that has the properties of *hayd*h blood should be treated thus, and that which fits the definition of istihadhah blood should be deemed as such.

i. A woman with a fixed term/date menstrual period may experience a flow of blood before the time of her period; yet it may continue even after the completion of the duration of the menstrual cycle bringing the total to more than of ten days. She must regard the blood that coincided with the days of her period as *hayd*h and the rest, i.e. prior to the time of her period and after it as istihadhah. She must make up for the acts of worship during the moratorium periods, i.e. before and after the time of her period, by way of qadha.

f. A woman with a fixed term monthly period may experience the flow of haydh blood for three days or more; it may stop only to reappear bringing the total duration from the onset of blood to more than ten days. Here there may arise a number of cases:

f. 1. Should the duration of blood, from first sight, be equal to the duration of her period, she must consider it haydh.

f. 2. If it is less than the duration of her period, she must deem haydh the duration of blood during the earlier experience, and the remainder istihadhah.

f. 3. If the duration of blood and that of the stoppage are equal to the duration of her period, the ruling applicable to such a case is the same as that in (f.1).

f. 4. Should the duration of her monthly period be more than the woman in the preceding case by, say, one day or more, she must regard those days falling within her period days as haydh, provided that they are not less than three days; the periods of lull should be deemed those of taharah and the rest istihadhah; thus, she is not required to remedy the shortfall of her period from the second duration.

The same applies to a woman with a fixed term/date monthly period, if she experiences a premature flow of blood as described in the preceding paragraph.

The Need for Ghusl of Haydh

66. Neither prayer nor fasting can be performed with haydh blood. No act of worship, be it obligatory or voluntary, can be performed by a woman, in haydh, unless she restores taharah to herself by way of ghusl after her period has stopped. This is because haydh blood causes a hadath as viewed by shari'a law; such a hadath persists, even after haydh ceases, until the woman have a ghusl.

Ghusl shall neither be in order nor qualify to lift the hadath, unless it is performed after haydh blood has ceased.

67. Both the ghusls, i.e. those of janabah and haydh, are one in their consequential effects on the acts of worship. In other words, any act of worship by the mukallaf shall not be in order unless they performed ghusl. So, whatever is required of a person in a state of janabah, as discussed in paragraph (39) of the Rules of Ghusl, should be required of a woman in a state of haydh or nifas. For example, the woman, whose period has come to an end, should perform ghusl or tayamum before dawn breaks, if she were to fast. Should she take ghusl/tayamum lightly, she must make up for the missed acts of worship by way of qadha'.

Forbidden Things for Women in Haydh

68. Just as the things, discussed in paragraphs (45/48) of Rules of Ghusl, are forbidden to a person in a state of janabah, so are they to a woman in a state of haydh.

Neither such a woman nor her husband are allowed to have sexual intercourse. Sexual union is feasible only after the woman has become clean of haydh blood and had ghusl, or at least cleaned her genitals. Should the husband let loose his desire for sex and eventually has intercourse, he would be deemed sinful; however, both shall not incur kaffarah. That said, the man can enjoy sexual intimacy with his wife short of a sexual intercourse. Yet, it is makrouh that he should resort to caressing those parts of his wife's body between the belly button and knees.

69. If the man has sex with his wife either before or during haydh, she becomes liable for both the effects, i.e. those of haydh and janabah. Should she choose to have ghusl of janabah, while still in haydh, this shall be deemed in order. The effect of haydh remains.

Other Rules Regulating Women in Haydh

70. A woman in a state of haydh should, after becoming tahir, compensate for the missed days of obligatory fasting, be they for Ramadhan or those for a vow. However, she is not required to say, by way of qadha', the five daily prayers, the prayer for a vow and the prayer for ayaat (natural phenomena).

The divorce of a woman in haydh shall be batil, unless she is pregnant, her marriage has not been consummated, or her husband is absent. This will be discussed in detail later. Should she be divorced in the belief that she was tahir which later proved to be inconclusive, the divorce is batil.

If, however, she was divorced with the belief that she was in haydh, yet she was actually tahir, what would become of the divorce?
A. If the husband was certain that she was in a state of hayd and that initiating such a divorce would never materialize, the divorce is null and void (batil), although it was carried out during a state of taharah, because in truth the husband was not intent on divorce.

However, he may or may not be aware of the hayd; yet he is not aware that taharah from hayd is a condition to the validity of divorce. Such a divorce is conclusive.

71. Voluntary ghusls and wudhu of a woman in hayd shall be in order. It is mustahab for her to perform wudhu and sit where and when she usually performs her daily prayer, facing the qiblah to chant the praise of Allah.

Ghusl of Hayd and How it Should be Performed

72. In itself, ghusl of hayd is a devotion, yet it is compulsory for performing obligatory prayer. Thus, the prayer shall not be in order unless the woman has had ghusl in conclusion of her period.

For the way to go about this ghusl, please refer paragraphs (10) and (11). However, niyyah of qurbah, as discussed in paragraph (53) of Ghusl of Janabah, is paramount. Furthermore, all the rules governing the situations discussed in paragraph (54) of the same Chapter are applicable in the case of the woman having ghusl after her period has ended.
3. Rules Concerning Women in Istihadhah

The Blood of Istihadhah

73. Istihadhah blood is different in properties from that of haydh. In the main, it is yellow, cold, thin, and flows slowly. However, sometimes it may have the features of haydh blood. None of the four conditions of haydh blood discussed in paragraph (56) applies to istihadhah blood, in that a girl below nine years of age and a woman over fifty may experience it. It may occur just before a fully blown haydh or after it, or even in between, provided the latter happens within a period of less than ten days. Insofar as volume is concerned, there is no limit to istihadha, in that the blood may appear for a day or part thereof; it may continue [on and off] for months or years.

74. Istihadhah is deemed a hadath which in turn calls for the restoration of taharah. So, if a woman has performed wudhu, only to experience the flow of istihadhah blood, her wudhu shall be rendered batil; thus, she should restore taharah to herself in the manner discussed in paragraph (89). That said, no consequences shall be attributed to istihadhah blood if it remains trapped inside the uterus.
Types of Istihadhah and the Effect on Performing Prayer

75. Istihadhah is divided into three categories in the light of the volume of blood flow, i.e. being either scant or abundant. So, the types may be labelled minor, medium, or major. This classification may be reached after the woman has checked, by placing a piece of cotton [or a tampon] inside the female organ, or by any other device.

If the piece of cotton is not saturated with blood, the woman should conclude that she has a minor istihadhah. She is therefore required, as a matter of ihtiyat wujubi, to change the tampon, clean her genitals, and perform wudhu for each and every prayer, be it wajib or mustahab. However, she is not required to renew her wudhu for precautionary ruku', the forgotten parts of prayer, and the sajdatay-as-sahu; please refer to paragraph(46) on The General Guidelines on Prayer.

It is not recommended that she performs two prayers in one wudhu.

Should the blood soak the tampon without dripping from it, the istihadhah is a medium one. She is therefore required, as a matter of ihtiyat wujubi, to change the tampon, clean the towel or change it, [if it is of the disposable type], have one ghusl everyday before subh (fajr) prayer coupled with a wudhu for this prayer. There is no harm in delaying the wudhu until ghusl has been performed. In addition to that, she must have wudhu for each and every prayer; it is advisable that she does not perform two prayers in one wudhu.

Should the blood drip from the tampon and/or flow outside the female organ, the _istihadhah_ is a major one. The woman is required, as a matter of _ihtiyat wujubi_, to change the tampon and towel, clean her genitals, perform three _ghusls_ in a day, one for _subh_ prayer, a second for _dhuhur_ and _asr_ prayers, and a third for _maghrib_ and _isha’_ prayers. Such _ghusls_ would relieve her from performing _wudhu_.

76. In all the above cases, the woman, having performed whatever is required of her of _ghusl_ and _wudhu_, should hasten to perform prayer. That said, she is free to perform any _mustahab_ acts of worship prior to the prayer, such as _adhan_ and _iqamah_, and during prayer, such as _qunoot_.

If she is lethargic in taking to prayer, she should perform the process of restoring _taharah_ to herself again and say prayer.

77. If the woman in a state of _istihadhah_, even of the major type, discharges whatever obligations required of her in order to perform her prayer, she is allowed to say any other prayer, provided that she performs _wudhu_ for each and every prayer; thus, she is not required to re-new _ghusl_.

General Rules on Istihadhah Type of Blood

78. After the woman had become clean of _istihadhah_, she did hasten to restore _taharah_ to herself. Is she justified in so doing?

A. She should have hastened to restore _taharah_ which is incumbent on her and say prayer. If the flow of blood ceases during the process of restoring _taharah_ or prayer, she should, as a matter of ihtiyat wujubi, renew both the taharah and the prayer. If the flow of blood ceases after prayer, she is not required to repeat it. However, if she is experiencing a medium or major istihadhah, it is obligatory on her to have ghusl for the next prayer.

79 Should there be a chance of the blood stopping to allow for both the ghusl and the prayer, the woman should seize it even with the delay. If she performs prayer ahead of such an opportunity, her prayer is batil, although it is performed with ghusl and wudhu. Should such an opportunity be squandered so much so that prayer is deliberately delayed, she be deemed sinful. However, there is no harm in such an omission due to forgetfulness; she is therefore required to restore taharah to herself and perform prayer.

The woman may not be aware of this opportunity; she may then say prayer according to what her situation warrant. However, there may be a short respite from the flow of blood, to the extent that there may be room for both the taharah and the prayer. In such a situation, she should renew the process of restoring taharah to herself and say prayer.

80. The woman in a state of istihadhah may inadvertently forget to check the extent of her istihadhah by way of the tampon already discussed. She may as well choose to ignore the checking process. In both the cases, she is not allowed to be contented with what she has performed, unless she ascertains that what she has done is acceptable.

81. If the end of istihadhah materializes and the woman restores taharah to herself, she may hasten to prayer; she may as well postpone prayer to a later stage within its time scale. Accordingly, she should revert to the state prior to the istihadhah insofar as taharah and prayer are concerned.

82. Should the stage of istihadha shift from a lesser one to the next stage, she is required to discharge her obligations pursuant to the new stage. For example, a woman with a medium istihadha, having had ghusl before subh prayer, discovered at around maghrib time, that she was having a major istihadha. She is required to have ghusl for maghrib and isha' prayers.

82. Should the reverse happen, i.e. from an advanced stage of istihadha to a lower one, she should for one time perform the process of restoring taharah to herself according to her previous situation. After that, she should discharge her obligations in the light of the new situation.

83. The woman in a state of istihadhah, of all types, can enter any mosque and stay there, irrespective of whether she has performed taharah for her daily prayers.

Divorcing a woman in a state of istihadhah, even a major one, is allowed, i.e. contrary to divorcing a woman in haydh. However, a woman in istihadhah should not attempt to touch the print of the Holy Qur'an, unless she becomes tahir again as dictated by her situation. In other words, she can only touch the print of the Holy Qur'an if she was in a state of taharah permitting her to say prayer.
Rules Governing Medium and Major Istihadhahs

84. A woman experiencing a medium istihadhah before or after dawn could not have ghusl for subh prayer because she was asleep, for example. She should have ghusl for dhuhr and asr prayers and so on.

Should the medium istihadhah start after subh prayer, she should have ghusl to be able to say dhuhr and asr prayers; she is not required to renew ghusl for maghrib and isha prayers. Should the istihadhah start after dhuhr and asr prayers, she should have ghusl for maghrib and isha prayers.

If the medium istihadhah continues for a second day, the ghusl becomes obligatory from that day, irrespective of the time of the previous ghusl, i.e. before dawn, at midday or sunset.

85. A woman in a state of istihadhah should do her best, during prayer, to trap the blood inside her uterus, by sanitary towels and the like, where possible and without due harm. However, should the blood flow outside the female organ, she must repeat the prayer, taking the necessary precautions. That said, she is not required to renew ghusl.

86. A woman with a major istihadhah had ghusl for dhuhr prayer and asr prayer. She chose to say dhuhr prayer and delay asr. She must have a new ghusl for asr prayer. The same goes for maghrib and isha prayers, should the woman choose to say them separately.

87. Should the woman experiencing a major or a medium istihadhah carry out what is required of her of ghusl, her husband can approach her for sex. That said, it is permissible for him to do so, even if she has not performed ghusl, as a matter of voluntary precaution.

88. A woman in a state of minor or medium istihadhah can fast, regardless of whether or not she became tahir by way of ghusl or wudhu. Evidently, the fast of a woman in a state of major istihadhah is also in order. Its validity does not hinge upon carrying out the daily ghusls, let alone the nightly ones.

Women experiencing medium and major istihadhah, who want to perform ghusl, can be guided by the General Guidelines of Ghusl.

4. Rules on Nifas

89. Nifas means a woman in labour. Nifas blood is that which flows as a result of child birth. There are certain rules which regulate the nifas occurrence. These are similar to the rules governing a woman in hayd. A woman in nifas should abstain from all acts of worship. She must have a ghusl after she is done with nifas.

90. Nifas may come about even with a premature child birth, let alone a fully blown one.

91. There is not a minimum amount to nifas blood. It may be deemed as such even with one drop of blood. Should ten days from the date of the child birth elapse with no blood in sight, there can be no nifas, even though blood may pour out profusely after that period.

The upper ceiling for nifas is ten days from the sighting of blood not child birth. So, if it is sighted on the seventh day of the child birth, the end of such period shall be the seventeenth day.

92. Should the blood be sighted immediately after the woman's giving birth to her child, then stops for a day or so, then resumes before the end of the ten-day period, the entire period should be treated as nifas.

93. A woman giving birth to a twin, sighted blood after giving birth to the first baby. It then stopped. It resumed after giving birth to the second baby. Does the intervening period count as a period of taharah or nifas?

A. This time, even though it may be for one minute, counts as a period of taharah. Such a woman should cater for two periods of nifas.

94. The blood appearing during the time of labour just before child birth does not count as nifas, irrespective of whether it linked up with the blood of child birth or was separate. It should also not be considered haydh, unless one is sure of that; alternatively, it is istihadh.

As for the blood which a pregnant woman may sight before going into labour, it should be treated according to the rules concerning the blood of a pregnant woman which has already been discussed in paragraph (56) of the Rules on Haydh in this Chapter.

95. The rule of the minimum ten-day gap between one pe-period of \textit{haydh} and the other does not apply to the gap separating \textit{haydh} blood, before child birth, from that of \textit{nifas}.

96. Once \textit{nifas} blood ceases and the woman becomes clean again, the state of \textit{nifas} ends. This being even if the blood stops after one day or part thereof of child birth. Please refer to paragraph(91) of this Chapter.

97. A woman in a state of \textit{nifas} may have a fixed term \textit{haydh} of less than ten days. The \textit{nifas} blood may continue to exceed the duration of her period. If she is certain that \textit{nifas} would continue beyond ten days from the time of sighting the blood, she should end it, have \textit{ghusl}, and render herself in a state of \textit{istihadhah}. If she has hoped that the blood would cease before the lapse of the ten-day period, she has the choice to extend her \textit{nifas} period by two days or more, provided the total duration does not exceed ten days. She should then deem herself in a state of \textit{istihadhah}.

98. A woman in a state of \textit{nifas} may not have a fixed term \textit{haydh}. The \textit{nifas} blood may continue. She must observe \textit{nifas} and refrain from embarking on acts of worship so long as the duration does not exceed ten days. Should the blood stop before the ten-day period, she must consider it \textit{nifas}. The same rule applies to the woman with a fixed term \textit{haydh} of ten days.

99. \textit{Nifas} blood may continue beyond ten days. If a woman does have a fixed term \textit{haydh}, she should deem \textit{nifas} a number of days equal to that of her \textit{haydh} and the remainder \textit{istihadhah}. It then follows that she must perform, by way of qadha, the acts of worship she missed for the period beyond days of her haydah. If a woman does not have a fixed term haydah, she must regard as nifas ten days and the excess istihadhah.

100. Should a woman in a state of nifas with a fixed term haydah forget the duration of her monthly period, the rules applicable to her are those concerning the woman with a fixed term haydah discussed in paragraph (75) of this Chapter.

101. A woman in a state of nifas is treated in the same way as that in a state of haydah, in that she must resort to checking the state of blood flow or otherwise whenever she thinks that there is a possibility of the blood stopping, as has already been discussed under the Rules of Haydah.

102. Nifas blood may continue beyond ten days. For example, it may last a month. The woman in question should consider herself in a state of nifas for a duration equal to the number of days of her haydah, if she has a fixed term haydah. She may as well observe ten days if indeed her haydah duration is ten days or there was not a fixed number of days. It then follows that she must regard herself as though she is in a state of istihadhah for ten days, which is the minimum period of taharah necessary to separate nifas from the forthcoming haydah.

After that, she must wait for her haydah to come. She should then treat the blood as that of haydah, even though it does not have the properties of haydah blood. If a woman does not have a fixed term haydah, she should be guided by the nature of the blood to determine whether it is that of haydh or istihadhah.

103. The rules applicable to a woman in a state of nifas are the same as those for her peers in a state of haydh, in that she is not allowed to touch the print of the Holy Qur'an, stay in the mosque, have sex, or have a divorce. The same goes for refraining from any acts of worship, such as prayer and fast, so long as she remained in nifas. However, she should perform, by way of qadha, the days of fast she may have missed. She is allowed the things a woman in a state of haydh is allowed.

The manner of ghusl for a woman in nifas is identical to that of haydh, istihadhah, and janabah as has already been described.
Chapter Three:
Rules Concerning the Dead

Should a Muslim die it shall become incumbent on other Muslims, to cater for certain things, by way of wajibun kifa'ie (a collective obligation imposed on the Muslim community). That is, since burying a dead Muslim is one of these obligations, it suffices if only one individual discharges the duty; the rest members of the ummah are absolved of it.

1. Throws of Death

104. Dying sets in when one's term in this life is fast approaching. It is the moment when the ghost is given up. May Allah give us strength to face that moment. It is widely the view of jurists that when the throws of death set in, the dying person should be laid on their back, with their feet pointing to the qiblah; this view is based on ihtiyat though. It is mustahab to take the necessary steps to bury the dead person as soon as possible. However, if there is any doubt that they are not dead yet, it is obligatory to wait until they are pronounced dead.

The ulema, may Allah be pleased with them, have mentioned that if the throws of death take a longer time, it is mustahab to move the person to the place where they used to worship. It is also mustahab to coach them in reciting the statement of faith, i.e. bearing witness that there is no god but Allah, that Mohammad is His Messenger, and the Imams are Mohammad's successors. If the person passes away, it is mustahab to close his eyes and mouth, stretch his legs and arms, and cover his body; it is also mustahab to recite ayahs from the Holy Qur'an, and inform fellow believers of the person's death so that they could take part in his funeral.

2. Ghusl of the Dead

105. It is obligatory to accord the dead body a proper ghusl before its burial. Should it be buried without ghusl for any reason, it is wajib to exhume it and give it the appropriate ghusl where possible, i.e. barring any encroachment on the body's sanctity and precipitating discord or quarrel among the dead person's relatives. Otherwise, tayammum should be performed to the body, in a manner that will be discussed.

106. Ghusl of the dead makes up for obligatory ghusls of janabah or haydh.

Who should be accorded ghusl?

It is obligatory to perform ghusl to a dead body if the following points were present:

107. a. The dead person must be Muslim; Muslim children and the mentally ill are treated likewise; a four-month foetus must as well undergo ghusl.

Shia and Sunni Muslims are alike, for the common denominator is Islam. It is not obligatory to perform ghusl to the body of a unbeliever.

Should it become unfeasible to differentiate between two dead bodies, i.e. one might belong to a Muslim and the other to a non-believer, it is wajib to accord both bodies proper ghusl and funeral rites.

108. b. The dead person should not be a martyr, for it is not obligatory to perform ghusl to a martyr's body, in that they should be buried, after prayer has been said for their soul, without ghusl, embalming, or shrouding.

By "martyr", we mean the person who gets martyred in a legitimate battle in the cause of Islam. That said, such a martyr should have died before any other Muslim could manage to attend to him while they still have even a breath of life in them. Should such a person be found alive and then dies, it is obligatory to perform ghusl to their body.

The place where a martyr falls has no bearing on bestowing martyrdom on him, i.e. whether his body is found in the battlefield or outside it.

The Law-giver has covered a group of people under the definition of martyr, such as a woman in a state of nifas, a person dying under the rubble, a drowned person, those who die defending their property or family members. However, putting those people on a par with martyrs works on the level of thawab per se; it does therefore not extend to exempting their bodies from ghusl.

109. c. The dead person should not have faced his death consequent to a punishment. That is, no ghusl should be performed to the body of a person who was lawfully killed for murder, nor him who was lawfully stoned to death for committing adultery.

However, prior to dealing the capital punishment to such people, they must be ordered to have ghusl of the dead, camphor should be applied to their body, which should be shrouded with the wrapper and the shirt, normally used to cover a dead body. Once they give up the spirit, their body should be wrapped with the third piece of the shroud used to cover the whole body. Prayer should be said for their soul and they should be buried in Muslim graveyards.

To sum up, all the dead should be accorded the appropriate ghusl, apart from martyrs and those lawfully killed in punishment.

Who should carry out ghusl?

110. It is obligatory on every adult who is capable of carrying out this religious obligation. The type of obligation here is that of wajibun kifa'i. However, if none, among Muslims come forward to discharge it, all shall be deemed sinful.
The Way Ghusl, or the Alternative Tayammum, Should be Conducted

111. Three different washes should be carried out:
   a. Once using water with lotus (sidr) leaves.
   b. The second using water with camphor.
   c. The third using pure water.

   When a person in a state of ihram dies, while still barred from using perfume, it is not advisable to add camphor to the water intended for washing his body, nor should he be embalmed with it. You can neither apply perfume to his body nor his shroud.

112. Just as it is obligatory to observe the order of the three ghusls, so is it obligatory to observe the order of washing the body parts. That is, you should start with the head and neck first, then the right and left sides respectively. There should be a niyyah of qurbah in each and every one of the three ghusls.

    Should more than one person take part in performing ghusl of the dead, the niyyah of the person who is taking overall charge of the process is what will eventually count.

    Getting paid for carrying out the task of ghusl is permissible, provided that it does not run contrary to the niyyah of qurbah and that the person carrying out the task would not treat what they are paid as the price for the ghusl water, for example. Remuneration received should be treated in the same way as the price paid for the shroud, lotus, and camphor as well as that provided gratuitously.

    Care must be taken not to use more camphor or lotus in ghusl water than necessary, lest the water should turn into mixed (mudhaf), neither less than necessary.

113. The dead body can be accorded ghusl immediately after the soul departs and before coldness creeps into it. It is permissible to perform ghusl to the dead body with the clothes on. It is not permissible for the person carrying out the ghusl to look at the dead person's private parts, neither is it permissible to touch them with their hands during the process of ghusl. However, it is permissible for a husband and wife to do so.

114. In the event of non-availability either lotus or camphor or both, washing the body three times with pure water should suffice; however, niyyah should be made in lieu of the non-availability of each and every one of lotus and camphor. Tayammum should, as a matter of ihtiyat not wajib, be added to the three ghusls.

115. Where, for any reason, it proves impossible to accord ghusl to the dead body, tayammum should be performed once instead of the three ghusls. However performing three tayammums should, as a matter of ihtiyat, not be ruled out.

It suffices that the living should apply tayammum to the dead using the living's hand. It is not obligatory to use the dead person's hand in tayammum, although it can be done as a matter of ihtiyat.

However, tayammum is not warranted, unless ghusl is absolutely not feasible, in that should there be the slightest chance that the cause for not performing ghusl might be lifted, it is advisable to wait until it is no longer possible to do so.
for fear of the body decomposing.

116. Should ghusl become possible after tayammum, and before burial, the latter shall be rendered batil; it should therefore follow that ghusl becomes wajib (obligatory). If ghusl becomes possible after burial, it is haraam (forbidden) to exhume the body for this purpose, for what alternative option has been taken at the time is in order. The same applies if lotus and camphor become available after burial.

Requirements of Ghusl

117. The water used for performing ghusl for the dead body should be free and tahir. Lotus and camphor should as well be tahir. All materials should be mubah. The body should be free from any substances that may constitute a barrier to water reaching the skin.

118. Any najasah which may be found on any part of the dead person's body should be removed. However, should any najasah come into contact with any part of the body that has been washed, or after the entire ghusl procedure, only that contaminated part should be rendered tahir, i.e. there is no need for ghusl again. That is, so long as burial has not taken place. If any secretion of either urine or semen is detected, there shall be no need for renewing the ghusl, even though this may happen before the body is carried to its resting place; making the affected area tahir would suffice.
Requirements to be Fulfilled by the Person Conducting the Ghusl

119. a. Adulthood; but if a discerning boy carries out a book ghusl, it would be in order.

120. b. Sanity, in that the ghusl conducted by a mental would not be good enough.

121. c. Islam, in that ghusl conducted by an unbeliever would not be good enough.

122. d. Parity of sex between the dead person and the one who is conducting the ghusl, i.e. a dead male/female should be washed by their counterpart. Husband and wife are exempt from this ruling.

However, a male or female can perform ghusl to a dead non-discerning child, be it male or female, even if the dead child is over three years of age. What we mean by a non-discerning child is that he who has not attained the age where they feel that they should apply the standards of decorum.

Mahaarim, by way of blood relation, breast-feeding, or marriage, can perform ghusl to one another, without looking at the private parts of the dead.

123. e. The person conducting the ghusl can be the next of kin of the dead one; in this case they do not require a permission from any other quarter. Should the person coming forward to do the ghusl not be the next of kin, they should seek the permission of the next of kin.

The rules of inheritance should be applied to determine who among the next of kin should be given precedence over the other. In such a pegging order the husband, in relation to the wife, comes first; then the first category of relatives, the second, the third and so on. However, in each category, the adults take precedence over non-adults.

Should the next of kin not come forward to perform the ghusl, or drag their feet by not permitting the others to do it, or because they are absent and cannot be contacted, the marji', then the just among the faithful, should have the say in the matter.

124. Should the dead person have directed in their will that a particular person cater for their funeral, is it obligatory on such a person to carry out what he has been charged with? And if they respond, do they have to ask for the permission of next of kin?

A. No, they are free to refuse the task. Should they accept the task, they are not required to ask for the permission of next of kin, although seeking permission is, as a matter of ihitiyat, advisable. Should this be the case, the next of kin is not allowed to compete with them to execute the will.

Should someone ask, in their will, that a particular person oversee the procedure of their funeral, it is permissible for them to decline so long as the person is still alive. Once they die, the appointed person cannot retract. Should they take charge of the task, they are not required to seek the permission of next of kin. Moreover, it is within their right to prevent the next of kin or the others from embarking on the funeral procedure without the appointee's permission. This means that the appointee has precedence over the next of kin in this regard.
125. Embalming is the process of applying camphor with the palm to the seven spots in the human body normally used during prostration. These are the forehead, the two hands, the two knees, and the two feet toes. It is makrouh to apply any camphor to the eyes, nose, ears, or face. It is not obligatory to observe any order in applying the camphor to the seven parts of the body. Apparently, any amount of camphor would do. However, it is preferable that the amount used should weigh seven mithqal sayrafi (32.257 grams).

Applying camphor is obligatory to the dead body that warrants ghusl, i.e. apart from those who die while in a state of ihram for hajj or umrah (see para. 111). Embalming comes after ghusl; if the dead body be accorded tayammum instead, embalming should come after tayammum.

It is not obligatory to observe an order of which should come first, i.e. shrouding or embalming. Embalming can be implemented during shrouding or after it; it can be done before that; however, it is advisable that it should be done before shrouding.

The camphor has to be tahir, mubah, powdery, and having smell.

In taking charge of this process, niyyah is not obligatory. Any adult person, irrespective of their faith, can do it; it can also be accepted from a non-adult if they were up to the job.
4. Shrouding

126. After ghusl and embalming have been performed, the dead body should be wrapped in three pieces. This is so, regardless of whether it was male, female, transsexual, sane or insane, young or old. The same goes for the dead foetus of four months; if it is less than that, it should be wrapped in any way possible and buried.

The first of these pieces of cloth is called the wrapper (mi'zer), which wraps that part of the dead body between the belly button and knees, the shirt (qamis), which is used to cover the area from the top of the shoulders to the middle of the shin, and the overall sheet (izar) which is used to cover the entire body from the summit of the head to the tip toes.

It is necessary though that each of these three pieces should be capable of covering the piece that lies under it.

127. Niyyah as well as seeking permission of the next of kin are not required in taking charge of the shrouding procedure.

Shrouding shall be good enough, regardless of who has done it, be they young or grown ups, provided that they know what they are doing.

Should circumstance prevent the procurement of three pieces, the next best thing is using one piece that is sufficient to cover the entire body; if not, that which can cover most parts of the body, if not, that which can cover the genitals.

Requirements of the Shroud

128. It is obligatory that each of the three pieces of shroud, intended for a dead male or female, should be tahir, even from the sort of najasah which may be excusable in prayer, as a matter of compulsory ihtiyat. It should be mubah, not made of linen - as a matter of ih-tiyat, not made with gold, nor of the hide, hair or fur of an animal whose meat is not halal for human consumption, and not made from the hide of an animal whose meat is halal; yet there is no harm in using a shroud made of the hair or fur of such animal.

However, all these constraints should disappear when circumstances are not favourable. However, shrouding cannot be done away with, only when it proves impossible to have it done. Accordingly, if there is no other way but to use a shroud that is najis, or made of linen, or the use of which is prohibited, where choice can be an option, it has to be used in shrouding the dead. That said, it is not at all permissible to use a shroud that is maghsoub, because its existence or otherwise is the same.

There is no harm in a shroud made of a blend of linen and some other material, provided that the non-linen material is predominant. Should this be the case, both man and woman can be shrouded with it. Should it be made of synthetic linen, there is also no harm in using it.

Should the shroud become najis, it is obligatory to remove it and clean the place. This is so, even if after the dead body has been laid to rest. As for the process of rendering the shroud clean, it is left to the discretion of the mukallaf, but with due attention to preserving the sanctity of the dead body; it could be done by either using water, where possible, or cutting out the najis spot, or any other way without losing sight of the fact that one should eventually leave the shroud virtually intact; if need be, it can even be replaced altogether.

Should doubt creep in as to the propriety of the shrouding procedure, one must resolve the matter by assuming that it is in order.

5. Prayer for the Soul of the Dead

129. After the dead body has been washed, embalmed, and shrouded, it is obligatory, as a matter of wajib kifa'ie, to say prayer for the departed soul. All dead Muslims are equal in this treatment, be they Shia or Sunni, pious or not, male or female, sane or insane, old or the six-year old - who has learned the meaning of prayer before this age.

Prayer for the dead is an act of worship; thus it is not good enough without the niyyah of qurbah. The requirements the person conducting such a prayer should fulfill are the same for the person conducting the ghusl of the dead, discussed in para. (119) and the ensuing ones, except for the homogeneity of the sexes.

Requirements for the Prayer

130. For the prayer to be said and made good enough a number of conditions has to be fulfilled.

The corpse should be found and made available for prayer, because there is no such a thing as praying for an non-existent corpse.
The dead body should be laid on its back, with its private parts covered either with the shroud or any other cover, in the event of non-availability of a shroud.

The person conducting the prayer should face the qiblah, close to the body; the dead person's body should be to the right hand side of the person conducting the prayer, provided that there is no barrier between the two. The prayer should be conducted in a standing, not a sitting, position, unless there is a good reason for choosing the latter.

Taharah is not a condition for the validity of the prayer for the dead. It shall be in order, if it is performed without wudhu, by a person in a state of janabah, or by a person whose body is najis or wearing a garment that is najis. Neither the clothes worn during the prayer nor the place where the prayer is performed have to be mubah.

131. After making the niyyah of qurbah, the person conducting the prayer should utter "Allahu Akbar - Allah is Greater" five times, i.e. the number of daily prayers. After the first one they should bear witness that there is no god but Allah and that Mohammad is His Messenger; after the second, they should invoke peace and benediction for the Prophet and his pure progeny; after the third, they can pray for the welfare of the believers; after the fourth, they can invoke Allah's grace to be merciful on the soul of the dead person; with the utterance of the fifth one, the prayer comes to an end.

Keeping unbroken chain of all the utterances, invocations and supplications is essential. While those taking part in the prayer are involved in it, there should be no talking or actions not related to the prayer in order to preserve its sanctity.

Rules Concerning the Prayer

132. If the dead person used to hold a lofty religious position, it is possible that prayer for his soul is repeated, even after his burial, provided that it should not exceed the first day and night after the burial. Performing prayer for any longer period is makrouh.

133. Should there be more than one body at one time, is it possible to hold one prayer for all of them?

A. Yes, it is possible; this can be achieved in one of two ways.

  a. The corpses should be laid before the person conducting the prayer one in front of the other in a way similar to the formation of ranks in a congregational prayer.

  b. The corpses can be laid in a gradation formation, in that one body is laid first, the second is placed with its middle aligned with the head of the first corpse and so on. The position of the person leading the prayer (imam) should be in the middle.

The imam should use the dual pronoun if there were two corpses and the plural pronoun, if there were more than two corpses.

134. This prayer can be said individually and in a congregation. Those who are led in prayer should recite the five takbir (Allahu Akbar); they should also recite the invocations. The imam does not need to be just.

Should a person join in the prayer, they should start their prayer from the beginning, i.e. do five takbirs and all the other supplications. If the imam finishes before them, they should finish what is left of prayer with or without the supplications where possible.

135. If doubt during the prayer, or reluctance to say it, may set in one must not let it take over, in that they must say the prayer properly. Should there still be doubt about saying it properly after one has finished it, there will be no need to repeat it. However, if the person knew that it was not properly performed, it should be started again.

136. The body could have been buried without prayer or with one that is batil, for a reason or another. Prayer should be held over the grave, if it has already not turned to dust

The Form of Prayer for the Dead

137. We give below the form of this prayer.

1. Allahu Akbar

(Ashhadu alla ilah illal lah, Wahdahu la sharika lah); Ilah-han wahidan fardan samadan hayyan qayuman da’iman aba-da; Lam yettakhith sahibatan wala walada, (Wa ashadu anna Mohammadan abduhu wa rasuluh); Ja’a bil huda wa dinil haqi liyudhirahu alad dini kulshi walau karihal mushrikoon.

2. Allahu Akbar

(Allahuma sallli ala Mohammadin wa aali Mohammad);
Wa barik ala Mohammadin wa aali Mohammad; Wa tarahham ala Mohammadin wa aali Mohammad; Ka afdhala maslayta wa barakta wa tarahhamta ala Ibrahima wa aala Ibrahima; Innaka Hamidun Majeed.

3. Allahu Akbar

(Allahumma ighfir lil mo'mineena wal mo'minaat); wal Muslimeena wal Muslimaat, al ahya' minhum wal amwaat, wa tabi' baynana wa baynahum bil khayrat; Innaka ala kulli shay'in Qadeer.

4. Allahu Akbar

5. Allahu Akbar

With this fifth takbir the prayer concludes.

The phrases between brackets, after each takbir, would suffice, i.e. there shall be no need to recite the remainder of du'a (supplication).

Should the dead body be that of a woman, you have to say, after the fourth takbir, (Allahumma ighfir lihathihil mayyita). That is using the feminine pronoun for this main phrase and the remainder of the du'a.

6. Burial

138. Burying a dead Muslim, male or female, is obligatory, by way of wajibun kifa'i. This obligation also extends to Muslim children, including a dead foetus of less than four months. Should any part of the dead body fall off, such as nail, tooth, hair, it should be buried, preferably with the body, as a matter of voluntary ihtiyat.

How should burial be carried out?

After the body has been washed, embalmed, shrouded, and the special prayer performed for the soul of the dead person, it has to be buried in a pit in the ground. This is so as to prevent vultures and animals from devouring it; it is also necessary to insulate the living from the dangers and smell which could be posed by a decomposing body. The body should be laid to rest on its right side with the face and the front pointing towards the qiblah. Thus, the face should be to the right and the feet to the left in relation to the qiblah. Should the direction of the qiblah not be determined due to lack of knowledge, the body should be laid to face any direction the qiblah believed to be in. If this is not feasible too, any direction would do.

A seafarer or traveller dying at sea can be buried there. The body could be weighted, placed in a solid water-proof container and thrown overboard into the see, after it has been accorded the required funeral rites. This should however be as a last resort, especially if it is not feasible to preserve the body from decomposing and/or bury it in the mainland.

The Place of Burial

139. Burial should take place in the ground. However, placing the body in a coffin and burying it would be in order. That said, lawful burial would not materialize by depositing the body in a place and having a building over it; this cannot be allowed, even on a temporary basis in the hope that the remains may sometime in the future be moved somewhere else, such as the holy places, for a final burial. Should this be resorted to, it would constitute postponing the religious duty which calls for a swift and proper burial of the dead. So, there is no alternative to burying in the ground.
Rules Concerning the Dead

The plot of land where the body would finally rest should satisfy the following:

a. The land should be lawfully mubah. Accordingly, it is not permissible to use for burial a land owned by the others without their permission, neither can a land which is waqf (covenanted) for purposes other than burial be used for burial.

b. It is not permissible to bury a dead Muslim in a place that is despised, such as rubbish tips.

c. It is not permissible to bury a dead Muslim in the graveyards dedicated to the unbelievers, neither is it permitted to bury a dead unbeliever in Muslim cemeteries.

Should a non-Muslim woman get lawfully pregnant by a Muslim, the baby is treated in the same way as its father. If she dies after the spirit enters the foetus causing the baby to die as well, she must be buried in the graveyards of Muslims. However, she must be laid to rest on her left side with her back to the qiblah, so that the foetus should face the qiblah.

That said, it is advisable, as a matter of ihtiyat mustahab, that the foetus right cheek be pointed towards the ground and

It is highly recommended and more meritorious if the dead is buried in the Muslim country they happened to be living in. However, it is mustahab to transport the dead body for burial in the holy places, such as Najaf and Kerbala.

140. Digging out the grave with a view to exhuming the body is haraam, unless one is absolutely sure that it has turned into dust. However, the following cases are exempt:

a. Exhuming the body is in the interest of the dead person. Among such cases could be that the place where it is buried may be a cause for denigrating its sanctity, such as the place being a rubbish tip or a sewer; fear for the body from the animals or being washed away by flooding; exhuming could be in execution to an instruction contained in the dead person's will, such as his wish to be buried in another place. In other words, the overriding purpose behind the exhumation should be striking the right balance between the interest of the dead and that of the public or particular people.

b. Exhuming the body should be allowed to forestall any potential dispute, such as examining the body to determine the cause of death and subsequent evidence and rights.

c. Exhuming is allowed, should there be a case for making good any shortcomings, barring prayer, as has already been discussed. In this case, one must not lose sight of the fact that preserving the dignity and sanctity of the body should be paramount.

d. Should there be a substantial amount of money buried with the body which belongs to someone else who insists on retrieving their money, exhuming the body can be permitted.

Digging a grave in order to bury another body in its place cannot be justified.

Other Rules Concerning the Dead and their Funeral

Providing for the funeral of the dead could involve the following:

141. a. Whoever, other than the next of kin, comes forward to take part in any action concerning the funeral of a dead person should seek the permission of the next of kin as has already been discussed in paras(125-126).

142. b. All reasonable funeral expenses should be taken from the estate of the deceased. What is meant by reasonable expenses is all that which is lawfully required for burial, taking into account the sanctity of the dead person. Such expenses take precedence over debt, inheritance, and the requirements of the will.

Whatever extra expenses, over and above the minimum reasonable expenses, such as money spent to buy a better quality shroud or a better plot of land for burial, and expenditure on mourning assemblies and feeding the guests, should not be defrayed from the estate.

Should the heirs and next of kin of the deceased keep the funeral expenses to the reasonable minimum, they can pay for it from the estate, regardless of the existence of the young and minors among the heirs.
Should the adults among the heirs choose to spend more than the reasonable minimum amount, they should meet the extra expenditure from their share of inheritance. If there are any young or minor heirs, they should not be made to contribute towards the excess amount.

If people other than the heir take it upon themselves to spend more than the required reasonable funeral expenses, they should not ask the heirs to meet the extra spending, unless what they have done was with the heirs implicit or explicit instructions.

If the deceased has directed in his will to spend more on his funeral, all such expenses should be defrayed from his bequeathable one-third of the estate.

143. c. What has been discussed in the preceding paragraph does not cover the wife who dies and leaves a husband, in that all expenses arising from her funeral should be borne by the husband. This is so, irrespective of whether she was rich, young, sane or insane, their marriage did not consummate, the marriage contract was a temporary one (as a matter of ihtiyat), or she was revocably divorced and died while observing the waiting period (iddah).

Furthermore, the responsibility of the husband in catering for the funeral of his wife does not stop at a certain limit, in that he remains liable, regardless of whether he is young or old, sane or insane, rich or poor, financially able or resort to borrowing for that purpose, provided that he does not put himself in an untenable situation - when borrowing.

Should husband and wife die at the same time, the funeral expenses should be met from her estate, not her husband's. If she has instructed, in her will, that her funeral expenses be met from her own money and that such a will found its way to execution, it is not obligatory that anything of the expenses should be charged to the husband.

144. d. If the person dies without leaving any estate, his immediate relatives, who usually pay for his living and other expenses at his life time, should meet the expenses arising from his funeral. If this is not feasible, Muslims should, as a matter of ihtiyat, do that. Funeral expenses can, in such a case, be met from zakat money, if it is available; whoever comes forward to pay for the cost of burial can, if they so wish, deem the payment zakat.

145. e. If there was doubt as any Muslim has come forward to cater for the burial, it is obligatory that this be addressed. Should it be known that lawful funeral provisions were not properly catered for, this has to be put right.

However, should the mukallaf doubt the propriety of providing for the funeral, they have to assume that it was properly implemented.

146. f. There is no harm in getting paid for funeral services, provided it does not run contrary to the niyyah of qurbah.

147. g. All funeral provisions normally accorded to the dead with a complete body, should be accorded to the body with missing part/s. That is, a body without limbs, a skeleton without flesh, or a body with part breast or the latter in full should, as a matter of ihtiyat mustahab, all be accorded ghusl and shrouding; camphor should be rubbed in the those parts of the body where the procedure calls for. Prayer has to be performed for the departed soul.

Should there be a piece of bone, of the dead body, with flesh on it, it should be wrapped in a piece of material and buried; prayer here is not obligatory. If pieces of boneless flesh were found, they should be wrapped in a piece of material and buried without ghusl.

As for any parts of a living person’s body that get amputated, nothing of the aforesaid procedures should apply to them. They have to be wrapped in a piece of cloth and buried.

148. h. It is not permissible to mutilate or apply dissection to a dead body of a Muslim. Any action which may entail denigrating the integrity of Muslim, living or dead, is not permissible.

That said, there are cases for autopsy and the like where certain situations necessitate waiving the conditions, among which are the following:

a. A dead foetus could pose a threat to a pregnant woman. Extra care must be taken to safeguard the well-being of the mother, even if extricating the foetus leads to its own mutilation. Should the surgery call for the expertise of a specialist not related to the woman, there is no objection to them carrying it out, provided that the procedure is confined to that part of the woman’s body that needs attention.

If the situation is reversed, every step should be taken to save the living foetus, even if this leads to operating on the woman by way of a Caesarean.

b. Should the medical profession call for training in autopsy on a Muslim's dead body, this could be allowed, provided that there was still the need for more doctors. The criterion by which the number of doctors needed for this sort of work should be judged by the death of ill people due to the non-availability of a doctor.

149. i. It is not permissible to pluck out locks of hair or nails of the dead body, either before, during, or after ghusl. Should this be the case, any removed parts should be buried with the body, for it is, as a matter of ihtiyat, more meritorious and mustahab to do so.

Ghusl for Touching the Dead

150. There shall be no ghusl required from a person touching a dead body while the body is still warm. However, that part of the body which comes into contact with the dead one becomes najis, should there be moistness and that this moistness crept into the part of the body of the living. In this case, only that part should be made tahir.

There shall be no ghusl too for a person coming into contact with a dead body after ghusl has been performed on it, irrespective of the presence or otherwise of dampness or moistness.

Should a person come into contact with a dead body, after the body has cooled and before ghusl has been performed, he has to render the part of their body that made the contact tahir as well as have ghusl for touching a dead body.
151. Irrelevant to the consequences of touching is whether the dead body is that of a male or female, sane or insane, old or young (including a dead foetus after the spirit has entered it). Irrelevant too is whether the touching is made with the hands or any other part of the body which has feeling, barring hair for example. If this was the case, ghusl becomes obligatory.

Of no effect on the ghusl being obligatory is whether the touching is done on purpose and with intent or inadvertently. All parts of the body involved in the touching or being touched are treated the same, be they exposed or hidden, such as the tongue, teeth, and nail, except hair.

152. Should there be scattered parts of the dead body, i.e. containing bone, they must be washed, if they were touched. For the ghusl to be obligatory, it is not a condition that the entire dead body, or a larger chunk of it, should be there. However, it is not obligatory to have ghusl for touching only flesh or bone. That said, there is, as a matter of ihtiyat, no harm in having ghusl for touching the bone of a dead person.

In the event of any part of a living person getting removed, it is obligatory to have ghusl after having come into contact with it. That is, if the severed part is boned flesh.

You should be led by the general guidelines discussed in paras. (7) and those that followed it for conducting ghusl of touching a dead body.

153. It is permissible for a person who has become liable to ghusl of touching a dead body to enter the mosques and holy shrines and stay there as long as it takes.
They should be governed by the same rules concerning those who have done something which warrants ghusl; these rules have already been discussed in paraa.(3) and(4).

Mustahab Ghusls

154. Voluntary ghusls are numerous. Whoever caters for them should expect a reward. Those who choose not to shall not be considered sinful. Right at the top of the list is the Juma' ghusl. It is possible to have this ghusl during the period from dawn till the end of the day. However, having it before noon is more superior to delaying it until after midday. In the event of not finding water on the day, one can postpone the ghusl to the next day and perform it by way of qadha'.

155. Among other voluntary ghusls are the following:

a. Ghusls for the inaugural days of both Eidul Fitr and Eidul Adhha.

b. Ghusl for the eighth and ninth (Arafat) days of Thil Hijjah.

c. Ghusl for the first, the seventeenth, the nineteenth, the twenty first, the twenty third, and the twenty fourth nights of Ramadhan.

d. Ghusl for wearing ihraam.

f. Ghusl for seeking repentance.

g. Ghusl for the visitation of the shrine of Imam Hussain (a.s.); this is confined to actually paying respect to his tomb, i.e. not paying tribute from afar.

h. Ghusl for taking istikharah (The process of asking Allah for proper guidance in certain matters you are unable to decide on, through, for example, consulting the verses of the Holy Qur'an).

i. Ghusl for istikra' (prayer for rainfall).

156. It is to be noted though that the aforesaid ghusls fall into three categories. The first requires the ghusl at a certain time, such as the ghusl for the first day of the Eid, the second for entering into a place, such as entering Makkah, the third for commissioning a certain action, such as the ghusl for wearing ihraam. So, the said ghusls have to be had with due attention to the time, place, and action (devotion).

Should anything that breaches the ghusl happen before commissioning the action, in the same way wudhu may be breached, one has to renew the ghusl.

The worshipper should be led by the general guidelines of ghusl discussed in paras. (7) and those that followed it for conducting those mustahab ghusls. All such ghusls make up for wudhu as has already been discussed in para.(5)
Chapter Four:

Tayammum

1. Tayammum comprises (a) wiping of the forehead and eyebrows, using the inside of the hands and (b) wiping the upper parts of the two hands with the inside of one another.

Like wudhu and ghusl, tayammum is an act of worship which cannot be deemed good enough unless it is done with the niyyah of qurbah. Tayammum is performed using dust or soil as opposed to using water in wudhu and ghusl.

Tayammum is an alternative to wudhu and ghusl where both are not feasible. That is why it is called an emergency taharah.

Why should tayammum be justified?

Water may not be available for the person to perform either wudhu or ghusl for prayer as may the case be, or it could be available, but they cannot use it due to illness or any other reason.

In the event of availability of water and feasibility of using it, tayammum cannot be sanctioned. It therefore follows that wudhu or ghusl becomes obligatory. However, there are two rare exceptional cases:

a. Tayammum could be condoned for performing prayer for the souls of the dead, although such prayer can be said without wudhu or tayamum.

b. If, at the time of going to bed, a person remembered that they were not in a state of taharah, by way of wudhu, some jurists have permitted this alternative route. Yet, we are not so sure that this can be sanctioned.

For tayammum to be a last resort there must exist two reasons:

1. Non-availability of Water

   By this we mean the following:

2. a. Non-availability of water within the entire area within the mukallaf’s reach, so long as there is still time to perform prayer. Neither the scarcity of water, nor its characteristics having any bearing on this factor. In such a case, tayammum becomes obligatory.

3. b. Water could be available within the vicinity of the mukallaf. Yet, fetching it may place them in an untenable situation, irrespective of whether the difficulty was material or moral. The mukallafs can in this case resort to tayammum instead of wudhu. However, if they chose to bear such a difficulty arising from fetching the water and got hold of it, they have to take to wudhu which will then be deemed good enough.

4. c. Water could be available within the vicinity of the persons and within their reach. Yet fetching it may pose some external or internal dangers to their life, such as the route to it may be fraught with dangers or the person may not be fit to travel the distance to have access to it, especially there may not be other people whom they can ask for help. The ruling in this case is the same as in the preceding one.

5. d. Water could be available within the persons' neighbourhood and within their reach. Yet having access to it may prove impossible due to the reticence of the owners, or buying it may be very expensive, i.e. beyond the financial ability of the person. The ruling in this case is the same as in (3.b).

6. e. Water could be available within the persons' neighbourhood and within their reach. Yet having access to it may pose some problems, such as commissioning a forbidden act in the course of fetching it. The ruling in this case is the same as in (3.b).

2. The Use of Water May not be Viable

Despite the availability of water, using it for wudhu or ghusl may not be viable for any of the following reasons:

7. a. The short time left for prayer.

8. b. Potential danger to one's health.

9. c. Difficulty arising from the use of water, although not bordering on risking one's well-being, in that both the water and the weather could be very cold.

10. d. Using the available quantity of water may result in subjecting the person performing wudhu or ghusl to thirst, nuisance, or even it may endanger his health.

The danger posed could extend to the humans and/or other creatures.

11. e. Should there be a najasah on the body or clothes of the mukallaf, and there is an amount of water sufficient for either removing the najasah or performing wudhu, restoring taharah to the najis things takes precedence to using the water in performing wudhu. Tayammum should therefore be applied.

12. In the cases where tayammum is allowed, yet the mukallaf may, against most of the odds already discussed, manage to fetch it and eventually perform wudhu or ghusl, both shall be in order.

However, the only case where wudhu or ghusl is deemed batil is when performing either of them constitutes danger to or damages one's health.

13. It suffices to rely on the testimony of a trusted person to resolve the question of non-availability of water. It suffices too when a trusted doctor tells of the dangers to one's health from using water. That said, even apprehension that using water may endanger one's health would warrant desisting from using it.

Substances Used for Tayammum

14. It is obligatory to use for tayammum the earth or that which is garnered from it, provided that it be tahir and mubah. This could be dust, stone, sand, or clay. Indeed, tayammum shall be deemed good enough if its done with mortar, stone, cement, tiles, and marble so long as their original material is extracted from the ground. Tayammum shall also be in order even if it is performed by hitting the hands against a wall, so long as the wall is made, even in part, with ordinary building material.

15. It is not essential that the material used for tayammum leaves any trace on the parts of the body tayammum has been performed on. For example, performing tayammum with a polished clear stone is as good as performing it with dust.

16. The material used for tayammum should fulfill the following conditions:

a. It should be quantifiable, not grains of dust so minute that they are considered negligible.

b. It should not be mixed with water in such a quantity that it turns into mud.

17. In case, there does not exist a material satisfying the above two conditions, tayammum can be performed with whatever dust or mud. However, if both the materials were available at the same time, dust should take precedence over mud. However, if it is feasible to dry the mud or gather the dust to form a quantifiable amount of soil, tayamum could be performed with the latter materials.

18. Tayammum would not be good enough, if it was performed with that which cannot be called of the earth matter; this may include gold, iron, steel, copper, lead, and the like, or precious stones, such as agate, turquoise, pearl, and coral, or minerals, such as salt, antimony, and ash. Prohibitive too is the use of all that which is used for food and clothing. Furthermore, it is not permissible to use wood, or glazed building materials for tayammum.

19. Should the earthly material be found mixed with non-earthly one, such as salt, performing tayammum using such a blend cannot be deemed good enough, unless the amount of the non-earthly material is so negligible that you cannot call the material other than earthly.

20. Those who may not be able to get hold of any material to perform tayammum are allowed to say prayer without it. Should they, thereafter, be in a position to use either water or earth they should do so and repeat each and every prayer previously performed without wudhu or tayamum. If the situation persisted until the time for prayer was up, the person concerned does not have to perform prayer by way of qadha’, even though the latter should, as a matter of ihityat, be advocated.

The Way Tayammum Should be Performed

21. The person performing tayammum should hit with the inside of both the hands the source material of tayammum; this has to be done in one blow. With both the hands, the forehead, including the temples, should be wiped. The boundaries of this area should be the hairline to the upper part of the nose, close to the eyebrow. It is recommended, however, that both the eyebrows are included in the wiping of the forehead.

Then one should wipe the back of the hand from the forearm to the fingertips with the inside of the right hand; the back of the left hand should receive the same treatment, this time with the inside of the right hand.

It is mustahab to shake the hands after hitting the earth and before wiping.

Should there be long hair covering the forehead and temples, it should be lifted to expose both for wiping. As for the hair that may grow in them, it should be wiped.

22. To sum up, the parts of the body that wiping should be applied to are four: the forehead, both temples, both eyebrows - as a matter of mustahab, and the back of both the hands. The parts of the body with which wiping is carried out are the insides of the hands.

Every part that is wiped should be completely covered by the wiping. However, it is not essential that the part that is doing the wiping should cover the area being wiped. For example, it is sufficient for the forehead to be wiped with parts of both the hands, provided that they are used together and at the same time.

23. What is obligatory of hitting the earth with the inside of the hands is once, irrespective of the purpose of tayammum, i.e. be it instead of wudhu or ghusl. However, it is more meritorious to use two blows, one for the forehead and temples and one for the back of hands, especially when tayammum is performed instead of ghusl.
24s. There may be a case for not performing tayammum fully, i.e., for a valid reason. This could be a person with an amputated hand who has no alternative but to use the other hand only. Also, whatever left of the hand can serve as a full one. Should a person be unable to hit the earth hard with his hands, it suffices that he places it gently on the earth. Should a person be unable to perform tayamum themselves, he can seek the help of another person to do it for them, provided that the helper uses the hands of the disabled person for the task.

Should hitting the earth with the inside of the hands prove problematic, the mukallafs can use the back of their hands. If any of the parts intended for tayamum is covered by a jabirah, the same rules applicable to the person performing wudhu should apply in tayamum, i.e., by wiping over it.

Conditions to be Met When Performing Tayammum

25. a. Tayammum materials should be tahir and mubah as has already been discussed in para.(14). So, it is not possible to a najis earth in performing tayammum, neither can you use an earthly material owned by the others without their consent.

26. b. The niyyah of qurbah should be present for tayammum is an act of worship, i.e., it cannot be deemed good enough without the niyyah. It is not necessary to name in the niyyah whether tayamum is being performed instead of wudhu, ghusl, or an emergency cause for taharah.
Tayammum

However, should there be two breaches of taharah, one requiring wudhu and the other ghusl, there is not enough time to perform either, two tayammums should be performed. There and then, each of which must be performed with that particular purposes, i.e. one instead of wudhu and the other instead of ghusl.

27. c. The steps required for performing tayammum should be followed in an orderly fashion, such as not starting with wiping the hands before the forehead and temples.

28. d. Where possible tayammum must be carried out by the persons themselves.

29. e. Removing that which could mask the surface of a wiping, or a wiped, part, such as ring.

30. f. Ensuring the interdependence and uninterrupted flow of the actions of tayammum, i.e. those of hitting the earth and wiping.

31. g. The place where the person performing tayammum is present should be mubah, i.e. not maghsoub. If the latter was the case, tayamum would be batil. However, if the tayamum material was used on the floor of a usurped place directly, it should be deemed batil. But should the tayammum material be placed in, say, a container on the maghsoub place, tayamum should be ruled good enough.

32. There are certain things which the person performing tayammum can do, by way of mustahab acts.

a. The immediate parts of tayammum should be tahir, i.e. not necessarily the other parts of the body.

b. The starting point of wiping should be from the hairline downward insofar as the forehead is concerned not the other way round. Likewise, wiping of the back of the hands must start from the forearm to the fingertips.

c. Tayammum for prayer has to be embarked on after the time for prayer has set in.

Things That Can Invalidate Tayammum

33. When tayammum is performed instead of wudhu, it could be broken, or made obligatory, in the same way wudhu could. Also it can no longer be sustained when wudhu becomes feasible while there is still time for restoring taharah by using water. Should wudhu become feasible for a short while, yet the person concerned does not take the initiative to perform it, he can no longer rely on an existing tayamum, i.e. he has to renew it.

34. When tayammum is performed instead of ghusl, it could be broken, or made obligatory, in the same way ghusl could. Also tayamum can no longer be sustained when ghusl becomes feasible while there is still time for restoring taharah with the use of water. However, the substitute tayamum cannot be rendered null and void by that which calls for wudhu; for example, should a person in a state of janabah perform tayamum and then sleep, or pass urine, his tayamum for janabah, would remain intact. He should perform wudhu for committing that sort of minor hadath where possible; conversely, tayammum has to be performed instead of wudhu.

The same thing applies to a woman having had tayammum instead of ghusl of haydh.

35. In the unlikelihood of finding water, a person could have tayammum instead of ghusl for touching a dead body; they may need to perform wudhu for, say, having slept or passed urine. One tayammum would suffice, in that they are not required to perform a second tayammum instead of wudhu.

Doubting the Validity of Tayammum

36. If, after having had tayammum, the persons realized that they did not do it as it should be done, they have to repeat it. Should they think that they, say, forgot to wipe the back of the left hand, they should hasten to do so, provided that there is no time lag. Conversely, they should repeat the whole tayammum procedure.

37. All the other cases of doubt concerning tayammum should be treated in the same way as their counterparts in wudhu. These have already been discussed in paras. (94, 96, 97, 100, and 101) of the Chapter on Wudhu.

Chapter Five: \hfill \textit{Najasah}

1. Types of \textit{Najasah}

Technically, \textit{najasah} is any kind of uncleanliness (\textit{khabath}) which may require the Muslim to remove it by washing before embarking on prayer. The opposite of \textit{najasah} is \textit{taharah}.

1. Any object is \textit{tahir} and should be treated as such, except for the source of \textit{najasah} itself and the things that become \textit{najis} on contact with \textit{najasah}.

2. According to \textit{shari'a} law, \textit{najis} objects/substances are those which are intrinsically \textit{najis}, in that they did not acquire the \textit{najasah} through coming into contact with something else which is unclean.

As for the things at the receiving end, they are inherently \textit{tahir} objects that become \textit{najis} on contact with the source of najasah. For example, urine is najis in itself, but your hand which may get contaminated with the urine becomes najis because of the contact.

We shall be discussing types of things that are inherently najis; we will give the opinions of other jurists in the matter and state our view where difference of opinion arises.

a - b. Urine and Excrement.

The liquid and solid waste matter passed from the human/animal body is inherently najis, i.e. it cannot be rendered tahir. How this waste matter is passed outside the body, be it through the natural passages or through other means, is irrelevant to the fact that they still be deemed najis. However, there are some exceptions:

3. a. Tahir are the droppings of all kinds of birds be they of the type whose meat is fit for human consumption, such as pigeons, or not, such as hawks.

4. b. Tahir is the dung or droppings of animals or birds, whose meat is halal such as sheep, cattle, camel, horse, mule, and chicken, provided that they are not fed on excrement for such a length of time that it may find its way into its body mass. Should this be the case, it shall be rendered haraam for consumption; and its waste is also deemed najis.

5. c. Body waste of creatures such as the scorpion and the beetle are not najis.

6. Our clothes may come into contact with a body waste of some sort. If we are not in a position to determine whether or not it is of the najis type, we should treat each case according to its merits, as follows:

a. We should first reach a conclusion as to the source of the body waste. Should we conclude that it belongs to an animal whose meat is not fit for human consumption, we have to assume that it is tahir, regardless of its species, i.e. being animal or bird.

b. We may not be in a position to tell whether the body waste in question belongs to an animal that cannot be identified, i.e. animal of prey or otherwise. In this case, we have to assume that it is tahir.

c. The body waste should be deemed tahir too, if we could not determine whether it belongs to an animal with or without body mass.

7. c. Semen

Human and animal semen is najis. The semen of such animals as fish and insects, whose blood circulation is not achieved through pumping [cold blooded animals], as is the case in humans and animals, is tahir.

Man's semen is quantifiable. However, there is no evidence that women have semen. Accordingly, they are not required to have ghusl of janabah, should they be sexually aroused.

8. Liquids, other than semen and urine, may be passed through man's anterior. Such secretions are tahir. It is not obligatory to cleanse the human organ from them. You may refer to para (78) of the Chapter on Wudhu for more details.

9. d. and e. Dog and Pig.
These two animals are inherently najis, in that everything in them, be it flesh, bone, hair, teeth, etc. is najis. They remain najis whether alive or dead. All species of dog are najis, be they watch dogs, hunting dogs, or police dogs.

However, this does not cover marine mammals, such as seals.

10. Animals of all kinds, including fox, rabbit, scorpion, and mouse, but not dog and swine, are tahir.

11. f. Dead Corpse

As has already been discussed, a given animal, such as dogs and pigs, is najis in itself. When it dies, najasah is compounded.

What we are addressing here is the animal that is tahir. As soon as it dies its body becomes najis. It should be noted, however, that a dead corpse is that which belongs to an animal which has not been ceremonially slaughtered, i.e. in accordance with the procedure sanctioned by shari'a law. How the animal faced its death, i.e. died of natural causes, got killed, smothered, or slaughtered not according to Islamic code, is immaterial. That is, it shall still be dubbed dead.

12. Certain groups of animal can still be tahir even after they die, such as fish, fly, and scorpion that has already been mentioned.

13. In the unlikelihood of concluding that a the blood circulation system of a particular animal, reptile, or bird does not function by way of pumping or otherwise, we should assume that its dead body is tahir.

14. Man, like animal, becomes najis after death. A Muslim's dead body becomes tahir once ghusl of the dead has been performed on it. Please refer to para (136) of the Chapter on Ghusl.

15. After the unborn baby reaches a stage where it can move, then dies, say by way of miscarriage, it becomes najis. If it dies before such a development stage, it is important, as a matter of ihtiyat, that it be treated in the same way. A dead chic inside an unhatched/hatched egg warrants the same treatment, i.e. it is najis.

16. Those parts of the dead body which contain life become najis after death. As for those parts where normally blood does not flow, such as hair, wool, fur, teeth, bone, feather, beak, nail, horn, and claw, do not become najis. Whether or not the animal is of the kind whose meat is fit for human consumption has no bearing on the those parts being tahir.

However, this does not mean that such parts of the dead body are impervious to najasah, in that if they come into contact with any juices, or moistness, of the dead body they turn najis.

17. Any part of the body of a living animal gets dislodged, chopped, or falls off becomes najis. However, anything that peels of the human or animal body, such as dandruff, the crust of a healing wound, and acne, is considered tahir.

18. In the same way the feathers of a dead bird are tahir, the egg found inside a dead bird is tahir too, provided that its shell has formed - not necessarily of the hard type.
19. Is the milk found in the breast of a dead animal najis?
A. Should the dead animal be of the type whose meat is fit for human consumption, such as sheep, the milk found in their breast is tahir. If it is of that whose meat is not edible, such as cat, the milk is najis.

20. Is the musk gland found in the male of a type of deer tahir?
A. It is tahir whether it was taken from a living or dead deer.

21. Is rennet tahir?
A. Yes, it is tahir in the same way the wool and hair of a dead animal is.

22. Doubt may arise as to the source of either meat, fat, or leather, i.e. whether taken from an animal which has been killed according to Islamic shari'a law so that we deem it tahir, or from a dead animal so that we consider it najis.

It should be deemed tahir, irrespective of who owned it, be him Muslim or unbeliever.

23. However, there are other aspects that could attract a different ruling. That is, as a dead body is najis, it is, by the same token, haraam to eat its meat, or say prayer wearing any product made of its hide.

Accordingly, it is not permissible to consume the meat of a suspect corpse found in the possession of a non-Muslim. However, prayer performed using leather from the same source is permissible.

That said, anything of the this sort being handled by a Muslim, giving assurance that they go about trading with it on the basis that it is halal, it is permissible to eat or use. There is one exception though, in that, should it be known that the Muslim trader acquired the goods without proper checking as to their origin, they become haraam to eat or use. More details about what is halal or haraam will be discussed in its appropriate place, especially those of prayer and food.

Should a person be in a position to know that the meat, fat, or hide has taken from an animal that has not been killed according to Islamic code of practice, it is both haraam and najis, irrespective of who owns it, i.e. an unbeliever or a Muslim.

24. g. Blood

Blood is inherently najis, regardless of the source it comes from, i.e. be it human or animal.

However, there are some exceptions:

25. a. Blood of animals who are not known for having a circulation system like that found in humans and other animals, such as fish; it is tahir.

26. b. Any blood retained inside the corpse of a slaughtered animal or its liver; it is tahir.

27. c. Blood sucked by insects, such as flee and louse, is tahir.

28. The clot of blood which may be found in an egg is najis, as a matter of ihtiyat.

As for blood which could lace milk while milking is both najis and turns milk into najis. The same goes for the small seed [in the conception process] which may develop into a clot, in that any blood seeping therefrom should be deemed najis.

29. Any suspect red stains found on your clothes should be deemed tahir. Should you suspect whether the yellowish fluid seeping from a wound or ulcer is tahir or not, you have to assume that it is tahir.

30. A person could conclude that the stain soiling their clothes is that of blood. Yet he cannot tell if it came from, say, a sheep to be deemed najis, or a fish to be considered tahir. In the final analysis, it should be assumed that it is tahir.

31. A person may establish that the blood found on his clothes or body could be his, that was sucked from their body by a mosquito, or that of any other human/animal. Such blood is najis, in which case it should be cleansed.

32. h. Liquid Intoxicants

Luminaries among our jurists considered among things that are najis liquid intoxicants. However, we think that it is more likely that alcohol, and every other intoxicant, be it liquid or solid, is tahir, although liquid intoxicant should, as a matter of ihtiyat, be avoided.

Accordingly, although liquid intoxicants are forbidden, they are not najis. It then follows that things coming into contact with them do not require to be washed or cleansed. From a najasah/taharah angle also, solid intoxicants, such as hashish, are tahir, albeit they have been declared haraam to use.
33. The same applies to grape juice, if it is boiled and turned thicker in texture, yet did not lose its two thirds. That is, although it is, as a matter of ihtiyat, haraam because of boiling, it is tahir. Should it lose two thirds of its original quantity by way of boiling, it should be both halal and tahir.

34. Grape juice may boil or reach that stage by bubbling but not necessarily with fire. It is haraam because it is wine. This is so, because brewing intoxicants from grapes is done in this way.

35. Juices produced from dates and raisins are tahir, regardless of whether or not they boil as a result of the use of fire. They are halal, if they are boil with fire or the like. However, if they are left to ferment in time, they are haraam because they will turn into intoxicants, although they still retain their taharah.

In the light of the above beer is haraam because it may lead to drunkenness; it is however not najis.

36. Among things considered najis are unbelievers. However, it is more likely that they are tahir, be they of the people of the Book or unbelievers. That said, it is advisable, as a matter of ihtiyat mustahab, to avoid them, especially unbelievers. People of the Book are those who belong to religions, such as Judaism, Christianity, and Magianism, that have been deemed abrogated by the advent of Islam.

37. Sweat

The sweat of both the bodies of human and animal, which are tahir, is tahir, even the sweat of a person in a state of janabah or haydh. However, some jurists are of the opinion that sweat could be najis in two cases:

38. a. A person may get into a state of janabah by way of committing an lawful sexual intercourse. Some jurists have ruled that the sweat of such a person is najis. However, we believe that it is tahir. That said, it is advisable, as a matter of ihtiyat mustahab, not to say prayer with the clothes that were exposed to the sweat.

39. b. Should an animal get used to feeding on excrement, its sweat is najis so is its urine, especially camels. We espouse such an opinion and advise, as a matter of ihtiyat wujubi, that it be advocated.

The ruling passed on such an animal remains in force until it is weaned from feeding on excrement for some time and revert to feeding naturally. That is, during its rehabilitation period, its meat remains haram and so does its body waste, including sweat.

2. Things that Become Najis

Tahir water could become najis on contact with a najis matter. This has been discussed in detail in the Chapter on Water, paras. (8) onward.

Things tahir, other than water, could become najis too on contact with a najis matter.

40. a. Liquid najasah, such as urine or blood, getting into contact with a solid object, such as garment, earth, or body, renders the object najis. However, only the point of contact becomes najis.

41. b. Should the aforesaid najasah find its way to a ta-hir liquid, such as milk, the najasah permeates the entirety of the liquid, i.e. it all becomes najis.

With reference to both the examples, we have to stress that the difference between the liquid and solid objects is not confined to the surface area of the liquid which becomes najis, but the depth too. Whereas the najasah remains localized when contacting a solid thing unless it penetrates the object, the najasah which finds its way to the liquid turns it all into najis.

Certain things may have dual existence. For example, honey could be set or liquid. Should it come into contact with the najasah while in a set form the rule discussed in para.(40.a.) has to be applied. If it is liquid, the rule discussed in para.(40.b.) should be applied.

The parameters for determining the material as having liquid properties are:

1. Its liquidity should contain some sort of moistness similar to that of water. Thus, molten gold does not fit this definition; accordingly, it is treated in the same way as any other solid object, such as clothes or wood, contacting a source of najasah, in that only the point of impact becomes najis.

2. The texture should be so liquid that if you scoop some of it, it immediately levels up. If the texture is so thick that if you scoop some of it, the rest of the material is not capable of filling in the gap quickly, it cannot be called liquid, rather, it is set. Insofar as najasah is concerned, the ruling here is identical to that applied to clothes and furnishings; thus, when blood comes into contact with the material in question only the point of impact becomes najis.

42. c. The source of najasah could be dry, such as dry blood or pig's hair. Should it come into contact with a substance that is liquid, the entire liquid turns najis.

43. d. Both the najis and the tahir things could be dry. Should they come into contact with one another, the ruling depends largely on the dryness and wetness of both of them. For example, if both were dry, no najasah should creep into the tahir thing on impact; also the tahir object would not be najis if it came into contact with the source of najasah, should there be slight wetness of the type that does not spread; if, however, one or both the objects were moist with the type of moisture that spreads on contact, the point of impact of the tahir object would become najis.

In short, the spread of najasah from any source to the tahir object depends on two main factors, the first is the contact and the second the presence of wetness.

44. If, according to the aforesaid cases, a tahir object became najis and the latter came into contact with another tahir object, would it render it najis, and how far would the chain of najasah go on?

A. The tahir object becomes najis, if it meets with the najasah directly, or through a second medium only, i.e. if there were more than one medium, no najasah would befall the tahir object.

It is noteworthy, though, that if the first medium, which turned najis, was liquid, it affects the second medium and turns it najis too. If it was solid, it would turn it najis as well, as a matter of obligatory precaution. That is, there is no difference between the liquid and the solid second object, in that they are both affected by the najasah. The third object should not be rendered najis in all circumstances.

Examples:

1. Suppose the floor of a room became najis. On walking with wet feet on the floor, your feet became najis. You stepped on a rug while your feet were still wet. In the final analysis, your feet were najis, as a matter of obligatory precaution, because there is only one medium, of the solid type, that separates them from the original najasah, i.e. the floor. As for the rug, it should not be najis because there are two media separating it from the original najasah, i.e. the floor and the feet, and none of which is liquid.

2. Najis water was spilt on the floor. Suppose you stepped on the floor while it was still wet. Needless to say that the floor has become najis as a result of the secondary source of najasah of the liquid type. Two media separates your najis feet, i.e. the liquid [water] and the floor. However, since your feet is separated by two media, they are ruled tahir.

Rules Dealing with Doubting the Spread of Najasah

45. In the event of doubting the spread, or otherwise, of najasah to a tahir object, you should not pay attention if you did not know whether or not the original source was najis. However, you should be able to ascertain that original source had become najis on contact by adopting the following legal criteria:

a. The availability of a tangible evidence.

b. The testimony of a trusted person. Whether the tahir object was in their possession or not is irrelevant.

c. The testimony of the owner of the object. Should they say that it was najis, it should be treated as such, regardless of the way they acquired the object, even if it was maghsoub. Of no effect too is their being adult or close to adulthood, and untrustworthy.

46. The persons may be in a position to tell that the tahir object could have come into contact with a najis object, yet they are not sure that wetness was involved. In this case, they should assume it is tahir. Moreover, even if they knew that either or both objects had some sort of wetness and that when the contact between them took place while there was no wetness, they should assume the object is tahir.

Conversely, the person should conclude, either directly or indirectly - through legal proof, that the object became najis as a result of the presence of wetness at the time of contact.

47. In the event of doubt arising about najasah taking place, it is not obligatory that the person should enquire or check. They should regard the suspected object as tahir until proven otherwise, i.e. either directly or indirectly. Even if, after checking, they think that najasah had occurred, they should not rely on this until they become absolutely certain that najasah did really occur.
3. Rules Concerning Najasah

Among the rules governing najasah shari'a has stipulated are the following:

a. Taharah is a Condition for Performing Prayer

48. The most important of these rules is that both the body and the clothes of the worshipper, intending to perform compulsory or voluntary prayer, must be tahir. The same should be observed when performing precautionary ruku and the parts of prayer that have been missed. However, taharah is not a condition for performing sajdatay-as-sahu, adhan, iqamah, or supplication after prayer. Yet, one should observe taharah voluntarily.

There are though exceptions to saying prayer with najasah; these will be discussed in para. (75) and thereafter.

Accordingly, if any part of the person's body or clothes become najis, they should hasten to render it tahir again or change it and wear another garment which is tahir.

49. Should the body or parts thereof become najis and means for rendering it tahir were not available, prayer should be said there and then. This is so because prayer cannot be waived for any reason. However, one should use whatever water available to render all the parts, or some of them, that were affected by najasah, tahir where possible.

The same should apply to the clothes, especially where there is no other garment available to perform prayer with.

50. Where najasah affects both the body and clothes, rendering the body tahir should take precedence over clothes.

51. Should the najasah be found in two places of either your clothes or body, and there be not enough water to clean both, the bigger affected spot must be cleaned first. If they were of the same magnitude, the choice of cleaning either is yours.

52. Should not there be enough water for performing both the wudhu and removing the najasah from one's body, removing the najasah should come first; tayammum should be the alternative. This has already been discussed in para. (11) of the Chapter on Tayamum.

53. Suppose a person has two garments and one of which became najis. However, it was not feasible to tell which one was tahir. What should they do?

A. Praying with either is not good enough, unless it is rendered clean and tahir. If not, prayer must be performed twice, one with each of the two garments.

54. Whoever knowingly perform prayer while their body or clothes are najis, the prayer is batil. This is so, if they were aware that taharah, of both the body and clothes, is conditional to saying prayer.

55. A person may have said prayer in the belief that he was in a state of taharah. After he has finished prayer, he could trace some najasah; he needs not worry, in that his prayer is in order and that he are not required to repeat it, even if there was still time for saying it.

Indeed, neither the knowledge of the person that he was tahir when he embarked on the prayer, nor the belief that he took necessary action to restore taharah to the affected area/s prior to prayer, has any bearing on the end result, as outlined in the preceding paragraph.

Furthermore, a person may harbour a doubt that either his body or clothes were najis. He then concludes that they were tahir in the light of the preceding para. (47). If, after having said prayer, he found out that he was najis, he needs not worry for his prayer shall be deemed valid.

56. Should a person be aware that either his body or clothes were najis, and forgot about it and said prayer, such a prayer is batil. If he remembers while there is still time for prayer, he should hasten to perform it; otherwise, he should say it by way of qadha‘.

57. While praying, a person realized that the clothes he was wearing were najis, even before embarking on prayer. His prayer is batil; accordingly he should cut it short, render his clothes tahir and resume prayer.

However, should the person be aware, while performing prayer, that his clothes were najis before embarking on prayer, yet he was not aware of this when he embarked on it, he should, time permitting and as a matter of obligatory ih-tiyat, resume prayer with taharah.

58. Should the person who becomes aware during prayer that his clothes were najis before he started prayer, he must, if time was short for repeating it, hasten to clean or change his clothes while performing prayer. That said, he should observe the decorum of prayer; otherwise, he should continue his prayer with the najis clothes. However, in both cases, it is mustahab, as a matter of ihtiyat, to perform prayer by way of qadha.

59. a. While praying a person's body or clothes may become najis. Should he know of the incident, he must hasten to restore taharah to the affected part of his body or clothes or change the latter and resume prayer.

b. If this is not feasible due to, for example, doing that which invalidate prayer, such as talking or creating a long gap, he should cut short their prayer, restore taharah and start afresh.

c. If either action is not possible for fear of prayer's time running out, even for one ruku, he should carry on with the prayer which will then be deemed valid.

However, where time is available even for just one ruku, it is obligatory on the person offering the prayer to resort to one of the two courses of action in (a) and (b), circumstances permitting, to guarantee that one ruku falls within the appointed time of prayer.

60. The same must be applied in the event of a person realizing, during prayer, that najasah has contaminated either their his body or clothes, without his being able to pin point the actual time of najasah occurring, i.e. before prayer or after starting it. He should conclude that it occurred during prayer.

b. The Spot of Sujood has to be *Tahir

61. It is a prerequisite that the spot where you place your forehead for prostration in prayer - i.e. that area where the actual contact with the forehead takes place - be it earth, paper, wood, etc., has to be tahir.

62. If performing sujood on something tahir is not feasible, doing so on something not tahir is allowed.

63. Should a person realize, after having finished his prayer, that he performed sujood on something not tahir, his prayer shall be in order, i.e. he does not have to repeat it. The same applies if the mistake is discovered immediately after lifting the head from sujood.

c. Using Najis Things

64. Eating or drinking najis things or substances is not allowed; this will be elaborated later on. However, there may be a case for making use of them outside the remit of prayer, food, and drink.

d. Selling Najis Things

65. Liquid substances that become najis can be sold and bought so long as they can be of use from a shari'a perspective as well as custom. An example of this is oil used for medicine.

As for non-liquid based objects/substances, which may become najis, there is no doubt that it is permissible to trade in them, for the simple reason that taharah can be restored to them.

Things that are inherently najis cannot be traded in. For example, you cannot sell alcohol; and although you can sell pigs to non-Muslims, who allow their consumption, shying away from it, as a matter of inhoor, is advisable. It is not permissible to trade in dogs, unless they are trained for hunting, for example. It is permissible to trade in other things so long as there is benefit in them.

That said, it is permissible to trade in other types of merchandise, provided that they have legitimate benefits.

e. Non-permissibility of Defiling Mosques

66. Desecrating any mosque is not allowed. If found, any najasah should be removed immediately, as a matter of wajib kifayat.

Not permissible too is bringing inside the mosque articles, or animals, that are inherently najis, such as dogs.

67. The extent of non-permissibility of any act of sacrilege covers the mosque's floor, walls, and all building material and fittings, such as windows and doors; furnishings and the pulpit. Other fixtures and chattel that have been donated to the mosque by way of endowment covenant are also covered. However, the obligation, by way of wajib kifayat, to restore taharah to the defiled places is confined to the building structure, i.e. it does not extend to the fixtures, fittings, and other items of movable property.

68. Should the mosque or its contents become najis by the action of a particular person, he must hasten to render the place tahir again, because they have more responsibility for rectifying the situation. However, this does not waive the public duty (wajib kifa'ie) of the others.

69. The rules pertaining to the defiling of mosques so far discussed apply to the holy shrines.

70. Also, it is not permissible to desecrate the Holy Qur'an. Should it become najis, one should hasten to remove the najasah from its print, paper, and cover.

f. Saying Prayer While Still Bearing Najasah

A person performing prayer is allowed to bear the following types of najasah:

71. a. Blood and pus resulting from cuts and ulcers. Although they are najis, yet you can say prayer with the presence of such najasah so long as the injury has not healed. There is no limit to the quantity of such blood or pus, and irrespective of its source, i.e. be it in an exposed area of the body or an internal injury or ailment.

The license to overlook such blood is predicated on the difficulty to remove the source of najasah or changing one's clothes. The yardstick of determining this is what is widely believed as difficult and untenable. If there was such a consensus, even the odd one who can manage to change their clothes to tahir ones without difficulty cannot be allowed to do so.

However, it is not obligatory on the person posed with such a problem to take necessary steps to stop the blood or pus spreading to their clothes so long as this type of najasah is allowed. Ointments and other medications used in the recovery process, as well as sweat, are covered by the same ruling.

Should doubt about the nature of any blood found on the body or clothes arise, it is obligatory to render the affected place tahir.

A person may not be in a position to tell whether the injury or ulceration in their body had healed. What should they do if they still detect oozing of blood or pus produced in an infected wound in the body?

A. They should assume that the injury is still unhealed; accordingly, they are not obliged to render the affected area tahir, until they are absolutely certain that the injury has completely healed.

72. b. Any area stained with blood which is less than the size of one dirham shari'i (the square area of one part of an average male's index finger) is allowed in, i.e. without removing it, provided that it fulfills the following requirements:

1. The blood should not be that of a dog or a pig which are inherently najis.

2. It should not be that of an animal whose flesh is not allowed for consumption, such as rabbit or hawk, as a matter of ihtiyat.

3. It should not be that of haydh, istihadha, or nifas.

4. It should not be that of an animal's dead corpse.

Should the stains of blood spread over a wider area of the person who is performing prayer, the total area should be the yardstick, in that the stains must be added up; if in total, they be equal to the size of dirham shari’i, it must be concluded that they are not allowed; should the total be less, prayer can be accepted.

Suppose that the little blood which is less than the quantity allowed by law penetrated to the other side of the garment or to another piece of clothing, what would the worshipper do?

A. If the penetration was confined to only one garment, it is allowed. Should it spread to a second garment, the total area of the stains on both the garments should be taken into account; if both the stains reach the target of dirham shari’i, prayer is not allowed with such soiled clothes. This is so, irrespective of whether the secondary staining occurred to a separate garment or to the lining of the original garment.

Should a little amount of water become najis as a result of blood finding its way to it, and a drop of this water turned najis and soiled the clothes of a person performing prayer, they are not allowed to say prayer with the soiled clothes, even if it was less than the area of a dirham shari’i. This is so because the license is confined to blood.

In the event of doubt arising about the size of the stain as to whether or not it amounts to the level allowed, prayer should be in order irrespective. This is so, even if the person concerned found out to the contrary after they have finished their prayer, in that they are not required to repeat it, albeit there was still time for saying it afresh.

73. c. Najis items of clothing and jewellery, of the sizes which are not capable of covering one’s private parts, such as socks, head cap, ring, bracelet can be worn during prayer. However, the following clothing items are exempt of this allowance:

1. Garments, such as those made of a dead corpse's hide.

2. Garments soiled with the body waste of an animal whose flesh is not allowed for consumption, especially where the najasah can still be seen. The same goes for the garment hosting parts of the such an animal. Prayer performed with such soiled items of clothing is batil, not only because of the najasah but for the necessity to remove the waste and parts of those animals from the clothes.

3. Garments made of the hair of such forbidden animals such as dog and pig cannot be worn during prayer. Indeed, prayer said with the worshipper wearing any garment made of, say, the fur of a rabbit, whose flesh is not halal to eat, cannot be sanctioned.

74. d. Things that are carried during prayer which could be either soiled with najasah or are inherently najis.

As for the article soiled with najasah, it is covered by the allowance, and thus a person is allowed to carry it in prayer. This is so, even if it was of the type with which can be performed, such as a big handkerchief, let alone that which prayer cannot be performed with.

That which is inherently najis can also be tolerated, even if it was part of a dead carcass, provided that carrying it would not entail its coming into direct contact with the worshipper's body or clothes.
Chapter Six: Purifying Agents (Mutahirat)

As has already been discussed najis things are of two types. The first is that which is naturally najis, and the second is that which has turned najis as a result of coming into contact with an inherently najis thing. However, we now turn to when and how to render najis things tahir again.

1. Restoring Taharah to Things that are Inherently Najis

Intrinsically najis things cannot be rendered tahir apart from the following:

1. a. A dead body, even that of a Muslim, is najis, as has already been discussed in para. (14) of the Chapter on Najasah. This type of najasah is inherent. However, taharah can be restored to the dead body by giving it a proper ghusl as explained in para. (111) of the Chapter on Rules Concerning the Dead.

Ghusl is therefore one of the mutahirat. As for an animal’s dead carcass, which is inherently najis, it does not become tahir with ghusl or any other means. Accordingly, its hide would not become tahir through any industrial process.

2. b. Should the inherently najis thing be transformed into a completely different thing both in substance and form, such as urine turning into vapour then liquid again and the carcass of a dead dog turning into dust, it becomes tahir.

However, the inherently najis thing remains najis, if no complete transformation takes place, such as turning the hide or hair of a dead carcass into manufactured goods.

3. c. Blood sucked by insects from whatever source, be it human or animal becomes tahir by way of sucking and becoming part of the insect’s blood. The same goes for animals, such as fish, whose blood is tahir, in that if the human or other animal’s blood is transfused with its blood, it becomes tahir.

The same ruling applies in the case of organ transplant, i.e. from a najis source to a tahir one; for example a dog’s eye transplanted in another animal that is tahir.
2. Restoring Taharah to Things that Became Najis

Although there are many ways of restoring taharah to things that became najis, water remains the prime purifying agent.

There are certain requirements for the water to be a purifying agent:

4. a. Water should be tahir, as using najis water in restoring taharah is not permitted.

5. b. The properties of water should not change as a result of the washing or purifying process so much so that it would turn najis. This has been discussed in para. (19) of the Chapter on Rules Concerning Water.

6. c. The water should remain pure water throughout the washing or purifying process. Should it change or turn into a mixed type of water before the process is over, the najis thing would not become tahir.

For example, if a dyed garment is washed with water so much so that the water turns coloured, before the washing process is complete, the najis garment would not become tahir. However, if the water can still be called as such in spite of a hint of colouring, there is no harm in that.

7. d. The actual najasah should be removed from object that has become najis, either before or during the process of washing. However, there is no harm in any smell, colour, or any attribute left in the affected area so long as the very najasah is not physically there. Should doubt creep in as to the removal or otherwise of the najasah, taharah cannot be considered restored, until certitude is achieved that it has been removed.

9. e. Washing should be achieved with water thoroughly covering the area affected by najasah either by pouring water onto it or immersing it into abundant water. One wash would be sufficient to render the najis thing tahir again.

9. The aforesaid condition, i.e. washing through saturation does not extend to the innermost part of the thing that has become najis. For example, should bread, soap, wood, or earthen ware become najis so much so that the najasah penetrated it to the core, it suffices that water reaches those parts, albeit in the same level of saturation, to render them tahir. To achieve this result, the thing soiled by najasah should be left in water or water poured on it for a longer period.

Better still is drying the najis object, then applying water to render it tahir again. For example, dough that turned najis could be baked then purified; drying the dough then turning it into bread would not achieve the required result.

Liquids that have become najis may be subjected to the same routine. For example milk turned into cheese; taharah could be restored to the cheese by leaving it in water. However, you cannot restore taharah to the milk that has become najis; so is the case with all kinds of liquids, except water. Restoring taharah to water that turned najis has been discussed in para. (25) of the Chapter on the Rules Concerning Water.

There are though a number of cases where taharah can be achieved, but with some extra steps:

10. a. Utensils that have become najis as a result of a pig drinking water from them can be rendered tahir again by washing them seven times.

11. b. Utensils that have become najis as a result of rats dying in them can be restored to their original state of taharah by washing them seven times.

12. c. Utensils that have been licked by a dog can be rendered tahir again by applying a mixture of soil and water first, then washing them once with a lot of water.

13. d. Clothes contaminated with urine, of a suckling baby or otherwise, should first be washed to remove the urine, then washed a second time with little or a lot of water.

In all the cases where we said that more than one wash should take place, succession of the washes is not obligatory.

Using little water for restoring taharah to things that have become najis hinges on the following:

14. a. The water should be tahir as is the case in abundant water.

15. b. It should be pure and remain so throughout the washing process.

16. c. The physical najasah should be completely removed from the thing to be rendered tahir again.

17. d. The water must cover all the area affected by *naja-sah; the innermost part of the object is exempt from this condition as is the case in abundant water.

18. e. The little water should be poured onto the najis object to be rendered tahir, not by immersing the latter in it.

Therefore, restoring taharah to the najis object requires one wash only after removing the very najasah; accordingly, it does not need a second wash or other complementary things.

The exemptions to the these rulings are the following:

19. a. and b. Utensils used for food and drink that turned najis through licking by a pig or a rat dying in them can be rendered tahir again by several washes like the routine of abundant water, already explained.

20. c. Utensils used for food and drink that turned najis by dog’s lapping can be restored to their original taharah if they are treated with a mixture of tahir soil and water first, then washed twice.

21. d. Clothes or body getting contaminated with urine can be made tahir again by washing them once, i.e. after they have been washed to remove the very najasah.

22. e. Clothes and furnishings, such as curtains and furnishings, that are susceptible to be soiled with najis liquids, such as urine, have to be wrung or squeezed to allow the water to drain out.

23. No allowance is given for the cases discussed in the preceding two paras. when it comes to contamination with the urine of a baby since the ruling is universal inso far as urine is concerned.

24. f. Generally speaking, food and drink utensils turning najis cannot be deemed tahir again, if washed with little water. However, washing could be sanctioned if it was done three times in such a way that each time water is poured into the utensils, then rinsed by turning the water inside to cover all its parts only to be poured out.

25. To render a fixed utensil tahir by washing with little water, you need to pour the water into the vessel, turn it around with, using a hand or any other implement, so that it covers its entirety and then drain it; this has to be done three times.

26. Just as it is possible to render tahir hard surfaces which do not retain water, so is it feasible to render tahir soft suffices after the najasah has been removed. This could be achieved by pouring water over it in such a way that it fits the definition of washing, albeit the poured water may penetrate deep into it.

Other Purifying Agents

27. Transformation (istihalal) of the thing that has become najis is capable of restoring taharah to it. For example, a najis piece of wood turns to ashes and najis water turning into vapour only to turn through distilling to water again.

28. When in doubt as to the transformation actually took place, you should conclude that the thing that has undergone the transformation is tahir.
29. The third purifying agent is sun-light. It renders the earth and all that is on it of buildings, trees, vegetation... etc. tahir

However, you should remove the najasah first from the object to be rendered tahir by sun-light; the second requirement is that the intended object should be wet. Moreover, drying up should come about as a direct result of sunshine, although there may be other contributory elements, such as wind.

30. The fourth purifying agent is the earth. By earth we mean our globe and all that is in it of soil, rock, sand, stone, plaster, and lime. Tarmac is included in the definition of earth.

However, it is essential for the validity of purifying najis things by the earth, that the following requirements be fulfilled:

a. The thing that has become najis be the sole of the foot or the footwear, be it socks, shoes, slippers, etc, including artificial legs and walking sticks.

b. The najasah that may have contaminated these things must have come about as a result of walking, or standing, on the earth, in that if the najasah came about from other sources, the earth cannot work as a purifying agent in this regard.

The earth being tahir at the outset is not a condition for it to work as a purifying agent; however, has to be dry to be able to work as purifying agent.

Once you rub the najis thing against the earth or walk over it, taharah is restored to it. However, the intended object is not going to be tahir, if you wipe the najasah off by using soil or stone independent of the earth. It is advisable though that the najasah is removed first, using any means for that, then the next stage in restoring taharah to the najis thing should be by walking or rubbing against it.

31. When in doubt as to the source of the najasah, in that: is it from the earth or any other source, restoring taharah to the najis thing by way of earth would not suffice. Water should used to render it tahir again.

3. How can one ascertain that the purifying process has really taken place?

32. When in doubt whether or not a najis thing has undergone a purifying routine, you should assume it is still najis, until proven otherwise either personally or by way of a lawful evidence.

33. A lawful evidence could be achieved by any of the following ways:

a. An unambiguous testimony that the disputed object is tahir.

b. The testimony of a person of an unblemished character.

c. The testimony of the person who used to own the disputed object or have right of disposal over it. For example, a servant testifying that she has rendered a dish tahir.
34. Should you be in a position where you cannot determine whether a particular thing is tahir or najis, having known that it had been in either state once before, you must conclude that it is tahir, unless the contrary is proven.

Other Prayers

General Guidelines of Prayers

The Common Parts of Prayer

General Guidelines
Rules Governing Prayer

Foreword

In Islam, prayer is the most important act of worship. It is the pillar of religion, as it has been narrated in hadith. Also, it has been related from the Prophet (s.a.w.) that, "It is the first of man's deeds that is considered. If it is deemed in order, the rest of his actions shall be examined. If not, the rest of his deeds can no longer be considered". "Its similitude is that of a flowing river. So long as you wash five times a day in this river, you achieve thorough cleanliness. The same goes for prayer; whenever you perform a prayer, you rest assured that your sins that fall between prayers shall be forgiven", said the Prophet (s.a.w.).

Mu'awiyah bin Wahab asked Imam As-Sadiq (a.s.) about the best of deeds, that is best loved by Allah, which could bring man closest to his Lord. He said, "I do not know of any thing, apart from knowledge, more meritorious than prayer. Do not you see that the good servant of Allah, Jesus son of Mary (a.s.) said, (...and He has enjoined on me prayer and poor-rate so long as I live) - (19/31)".
Our Imam Abu Abdullah As-Sadiq (a.s.) took very seriously the task of urging people to keep up prayer. When Abu Basir was led in to Um Hamidah, the Imam's wife to pay his respects on the Imam's death, it was reported that both cried. Afterwards she was quoted as saying, "O Father of Mohammad, I wished you were there when Abu Abdullah was in the throws of death. It was an amazing scene; he opened his eyes and asked for all our kin to be gathered together; she added that we did so. He looked at them and said, "Our intercession is not going to be granted to any one who takes prayer lightly.

Types of Obligatory Prayer

1. Prayer is divided into two categories. Obligatory and voluntary. The obligatory ones are six:

   a. The five daily prayers. These are subh, dhuhr, asr, maghrib, and isha'.

   b. Tawaf prayer.

   c. Ayat (signs) prayer.

   d. Prayer for the souls of the dead. Please refer to para. (129) of the Chapter on Rules Concerning the Dead.

   e. Prayer, on qadha' basis, of the eldest son for his dead father, as will be discussed in some detail.

   f. Prayers of the two Eids (al-Fitr and al-Adhha), only if it be held by the Imam or a just ruler representing him.

Practically, though, it could be said that , at the time of the occultation of Imam Al-Mahdi (a.s.), the prayers of the two Eids are not obligatory, for lack of requirements. However, the obligatory prayers are those mentioned in (a) to (e). The rest are voluntary and mustahab. They do not become wajib except by any of the general Wajib reasons, such as nadhr or oath.

The Format of Prayer

2. The maximum number of ruku in compulsory prayers is four, as in isha; the minimum is two, as in subh. As for voluntary prayers, the minimum is one ruku, which is that of witr (an odd number of ruku).

However, ruku is one of the main units of a prayer; the only exception is the prayer for the dead as it comprises a number of takbirs not ruku

The first ruku of every prayer, apart from Ayat prayer and the two Eids prayers can be carried out thus:

After niyyah, the worshipper should start with takbiratul ihram, i.e. by saying (Allahu Akbar). Once that said, you are truly in prayer.

Recitation of suratul fatihah, followed by another surah comes next.

After that comes bowing, i.e. by placing one's hands on one's knees and uttering (Subhana Rabiyal Adheemi wa Bi-hamdhih) - Glory be to my Lord, the Great, and praise belongs to Him.

Going back to an upright standing position.

Assuming a posture of sujood, by placing one's hands, knees, and toes on the prayer mat; as for the forehead it should be placed on something earthly, wood, or paper.
While in this position, you should say (Subhana Rabiyaal Al 'ala wa Bihamidih) - Glory be to my Exalted Lord, and praise belongs to Him.

Raising the forehead and going back to a kneeling position to be followed by another sujood.

Should the prayer be that of one ruku, the worshipper should, while still in a kneeling position say the following, (Ashhadu Alla Illah Illal Lah, Wahdahu La Sharika Lah, Wa Ashhadu Anna Mohammadan Abduhu Wa Rasuluh, Allahumma Salli Ala Mohammadin Wa Aali Mohammad) - I bear witness that there is no god apart from Allah, Who is unique and without partners. I also bear witness that Muhammad is His servant and Messenger. O God! bless Muhammad and the progeny of Muhammad. This is called ta-shahhud.

Then Tasleem, i.e. (Assalamu Alaikum Wa Rahmatul Lahy Wa Barakatuh) - May peace be upon you (all), and Allah's mercy and blessing) should be said. This is the shortened format of tasleem.Tasleem concludes the prayer.

Should the prayer consist of two ruku, such as that of subh, the worshipper should go back to a standing position before tashahhud and tasleem and repeat what they have done in the first ruku, apart from takbiratul ihram.

Upon lifting the forehead from sujood, they should assume a sitting upright position and say both tashahhud and tasleem, thus concluding prayer.

In a three-rak'a prayer, like that of maghrib, the worshipper should confine themselves to saying tashahhud at the end of the second ruku and go back to an upright standing position and say (Subhanal Lahi Wal Hamdu Lillahi, Wala Il-laha Illal Lahu, Wallahu Akbar) - Glory be to Allah, and praise be to Allah, there is no god but Allah, and Allah is greater. This is called dhikr. They should then go a bowing position followed by the two sujoods, and back to the upright sitting position to say tashahhud and tasleem.

In a four-rak'a prayer, such as that of dhuhr, no tashahhud or tasleem should be said at the end of the third ruku. Instead, the worshipper should go back to the upright standing posture to repeat the routine of the third ruku, then perform the two sujoods, tashahhud and tasleem.

Among the mustahab acts in prayer is qunoot (the raising of both hands for supplication) in the second ruku after reciting al-fatihah and a second surah, but before bowing. This could be done in a two, three, or four-rak'a prayers.

Accordingly, ruku', the two sujoods, and the utterances during ruku and sujood are fixed parts in every main unit (ruku') of prayer. Takbiratul ihram is part and parcel of the first ruku’, tashahhud and tasleem are parts of the last ruku, recitation [of the two surahs] are integral parts of the first and second ruku’. Dhikr is part of the ruku’ that comes after the second one. If prayer is not going to be concluded in the second ruku, it takes an extra part, i.e. tashahhud after the second sujood has been performed.

3. So the most important parts of prayer are the following:
   a. Takbiratul Ihram.
   b. Recitation.
c. Ruku (bowing).

d. Sujood (prostration).

e. Dhikr

f. Tashahhud.

g. Tasleem.

4. In addition to the aforesaid parts, there are other requirements which should be fulfilled. These are of two kinds. The first category should be fulfilled by the worshipper, the second category has to do with prayer itself.

General guidelines for the worshipper:

a. The person should be tahir and has performed wudhu.

b. Their body and clothes must be tahir.

c. Their private parts should be covered.

d. Clothes worn during prayer should not be made of parts of a dead animal or that whose flesh is not sanctioned for human consumption. Male worshippers should not be wearing gold or silk. As for carrying parts of the dead body of an animal, an inherently najis thing, or that which has become najis, it does not invalidate prayer. Wearing clothes whose material could be suspect, i.e. whether the animal was slaughtered according to Islamic practise, is allowed.

It is more likely however that there is no harm in carrying, in prayer, anything that belongs to an animal whose flesh is not fit for human consumption. Yet, it is strongly recommended, as a matter of ihitiyat, that one has to shy away from it.

e. Facing the qiblah, i.e. the direction where the Holy Ka'ba is situated, in prayer.

f. The intention behind offering the prayer should be that of seeking closeness to Allah, the Exalted.

g. When praying, the worshipper should designate the name of that particular prayer. For example, when praying subh, making niyyah to say it should be with the exclusive objective of achieving nearness to Allah.

As for the general requirements of prayer itself, they are as follows:

a. Adherence to the order of parts/units that comprise prayer, in that takbiratul ihram should come before recitation, and the latter before ruku, and so on.

b. Succession of the acts of prayer should be observed, in that there must not be a break or a long pause between its parts.

c. Placing the forehead during sujood on the earth, a piece of wood, a paper, or the like, as will be discussed.

This is a skeleton run on prayer and how it should be conducted within the prescribed conditions.

There are though other parts and special requirements where some prayers differ from the others. The prayer of the two Eids, for example, consists of additional takbirs. The daily prayers have to be performed on their appointed time. However, we shall be discussing the following:

a. Outline all types of prayer and how to conduct each one of them.

b. Outline the general guidelines, and parts, of prayer and discuss briefly the rules governing each one of them.
c. Outline the general rules of prayer in the form of:
   1. Things that invalidate prayer,
   2. Saying prayer by way of qadha',
   3. Shortcomings in prayer,
   4. Doubt in prayer,
   5. Congregational prayer,
   6. The differences between obligatory and voluntary prayers.
Chapter One:

The Daily Prayers

1. The Five Daily Prayers

We have already mentioned that the obligatory prayers are six. The most important among which are the five daily prayers. Accordingly, we will divide the discussion on these obligatory prayers into two chapters, one for the daily prayers and the other for the rest of them.

Foreword

The obligatory daily prayers are five. Although, they share certain common rituals and rules, they differ in some respects. These prayers comprise seventeen ruku. There are however thirty four ruku, in a day and a night, which are voluntary. These are called the daily supererogatory (nawafil) devotions. They are also called arranged supererogatory performances (nawafil murattabah) because they are characterized by their own appointed times to distinguish them from the other optional prayers which have no predetermined time.

Fajr Prayer and its Twin Voluntary One

5. Fajr prayer is the first of the daily prayers. The Holy Qur'an has described it as the Prayer of Fajr (dawn):
"... and the morning recitation; surely the morning recitation is witnessed" (17/78). It is also called by another name, i.e., Subh, because morning starts with dawn. It consists of two rukus. A male worshipper should recite al-Fatiha and the other surah at his own voice pitch, as will be discussed in para. (97) of the Chapter on General Guidelines.

6. There is a prescribed time for Fajr prayer. It starts with dawn until sunrise. Its time span is roughly an hour and a half.

Fajr is the inaugural part of daylight which precedes sunrise. This light appears in the horizon as a column surrounded by darkness. The column then starts expanding sideways as well as upwards.

The moment of Fajr is the actual spread of light horizontally which is readily distinguishable from the darkness of night.

As for the duration before that, where the light is a mere column, it is called false dawn. Prayer cannot be performed during that spell of time.
7. The time for Fajr prayer draws to an end with sunrise. However, the ideal time for prayer should, from a shari'a standpoint, be before sunrise. Prior to sunrise there should appear in the horizon the morning glow, which heralds the rising of the sun. With the appearance of that glow, the prime time for Fajr prayer ends.

Should a person delay the saying of prayer till the time of the glow, thus performing it before sunrise, they would have missed the superior time of Fajr. However, they are deemed as though they have discharged what is required of them; thus they should not be deemed guilty.

8. There is a voluntary prayer which could be said either before or in tandem with Fajr prayer. It is a two-rak'a prayer identical to that of Fajr. Once embarked on, the worshipper must perform it with the niyyah of qurbah.

9. The time of this prayer starts with the last sixth portion of the night. Its time continues until sunrise. However, it is more meritorious, as a matter of ikhityat, that it should not be delayed till the time of the morning dusk when the end of the prime time for Fajr prayer sets in.

10. Accordingly, this voluntary prayer should not be performed before the last sixth of the night. There is one exception though, in that it could be said immediately after salatul lail (night prayer) which is another form of voluntary prayer that will be discussed in some detail.

11. Fajr voluntary prayer should be performed before the obligatory Fajr one. Should the time for saying the obligatory one become critical, the voluntary prayer could be said after it, but before sunrise.
Dhuhr Prayer and its Twin Voluntary One

12. Dhuhr prayer is the second of the daily prayers. It is called the middle prayer. They Holy Qur'an has reiterated its importance, "Attend constantly to prayers and to the middle prayer and stand up truly obedient to Allah". (2/238).

It has been said that it was named thus because it falls halfway between two daily prayers, i.e. those of fajr and asr.

13. Dhuhr consists of four ruku. However, it could be reduced to two ruku as a concession for a person on the move (musafir) in accordance with a certain criterion that will be discussed in the Chapter on the General Guidelines and Rules of the daily prayers.

The recitation of the two surahs in the first two ruku should be inaudible (ikhfati), apart from the basmalah. However, dhuhr prayer performed on a Friday can be recited audibly (jahri). Recitation of tasbeeh (The utterance of "Subhanallahi, wa Hamdu Lillahi, wa Allahi Illal Lahu, Wallahu Akbar" - Glory be to Allah, Praise be to Allah, there is no god but Allah, and Allah is Greater) in the remaining two ruku should be done in a whispered manner (ikhfati) all the time.

14. The time for dhuhr prayer starts halfway between sunrise and sunset, i.e. midday. The start of time for dhuhr prayer is called zawaal. That is, the start falls in the second period of the day.

Zawaal may be determined through a number of ways.

15. a. Once you have fixed the times of both sunrise and sunset, you can determine zawaal being the half way mark between the two.

16. b. By way of shade. When the sun shines it creates a shadow for the object it shines on. For example, a wall situated exactly between North and South. At the start of the day, the wall will have a shadow on the opposite side of the sun, i.e., to the West. So long as the sun keeps rising, the shadow keeps shrinking. At the point of zawaal, it more or less, disappears insofar as its western side is concerned. Thereafter, the shadow begins to form on the eastern side of the wall.

Once one notices the complete disappearance of the shadow from the western side and its appearance on the eastern one, they should conclude that the time for dhuhur prayer has come.

17. c. The third method of determining zawaal is by identifying the direction of the South. By setting your face towards the South and noticing the decline of the sun towards your right-hand side eye brow, you should conclude that the time for dhuhur has come.

18. The time for dhuhur can extend as far as sunset. However, if a person has not said both the prayers, i.e., dhuhur and asr, so much so that there will not be ample time to say both save one, they should assume that the time for dhuhur is up for the sake of saying asr.

However, if there are but five minutes left, assuming that each ruku takes one minute, the person should start saying dhuhur and immediately on completion should say asr.

19. However, although the time for dhuhur may extend to sunset, it is better to say it on its prime time, which, by the way, does not extend to sunset. It starts with the time of zawaal and ends when the shadow of any object reaches one seventh of its height. So, if, say, a wall was seven meters high, its shadow should be four meters long.

20. Dhuhr obligatory prayer has a voluntary sister. The latter comprises four prayers, each of which comprises two ruku’. It should be said with the niyyah of qur-bah.

21. The time of this voluntary prayer is the as that of dhuhur. It can be said before the obligatory one. Yet, should the worshipper delay saying dhuhur at an earlier time, thus missing its prime time, it is preferable to start saying the obligatory one.

22. Accordingly, it is not permissible to bring forward voluntary dhuhur prayer, i.e. to say it before time. However, there are two exemptions:

a. On a Friday, a person can say voluntary dhuhur prayer before zawaal.

b. Should you be aware that you might, around zawaal time, be attending to some sort of a private business, you can say this voluntary prayer before zawaal.

Asr Prayer and its Voluntary Sister

23. This is the third obligatory daily prayer. Its format is identical to that of dhuhur. The only difference is in the niyyah where the worshipper should specify that it is asr they are performing.

However, there is also no substitute for asr, as in the case of dhuhur where Friday prayer can substitute it on certain occasions.
24. The time for asr prayer is zawaal. However, it must be performed after dhuhur. Accordingly, the worshipper is not allowed to switch, especially if they are aware of the prohibition. Should they nevertheless do so, they have to say dhuhur and repeat asr after it.

25. Should a person realize, during asr prayer that he did not say dhuhur before that, he must assume that the prayer in progress is that of dhuhur. Once he has finished with it, he should say asr.

26. Should the person be unaware until he has finished the prayer in hand, it (asr) shall be in order, irrespective of whether he started the prayer at the start of zawaal or midway. He must though perform dhuhur after that.

In exactly the same situation, a person who is not aware of the rules can be excused for saying asr before dhuhur. That is, he is required to repeat his prayer.

27. The time for asr prayer is until sunset. Should there not be ample time to accommodate both the prayers, i.e., those of dhuhur and asr, asr takes precedence over dhuhur, contrary to the earlier time where it is obligatory to start with dhuhur first.

28. However, the ideal time span for asr is zawaal till the shadow, already discussed, extends between two and six sevenths of the original height of the object (i.e., the wall in the example given above).

29. There is a voluntary prayer which may be said between dhuhur and asr. It consists of four prayers of two-rak'a each, i.e., similar to the voluntary dhuhur prayer. However, it could be reduced to either three or two prayers of two-\textit{rak'a} each. Should there not be enough time for \textit{asr}, it is preferable to say \textit{Asr}, then the voluntary one.

\textbf{Maghrib} Prayer and its Voluntary Sister

30. This is the fourth of the obligatory daily prayers. It comprises three \textit{ruku'}. The \textit{niyyah of qurbah} is an integral part of it. In the first two \textit{ruku'}. the recitation of the two surahs should be audible. Recitation of \textit{tasbeeh} in the third \textit{ruku'} should be inaudible.

31. The time for \textit{maghrib} prayer starts with sunset, i.e. the disappearance of the sun disc beyond the horizon. However, the disappearance of the sun to the naked eye shall not be complete unless the bronze glow in the East disappears. When the latter vanishes, the actual time for \textit{maghrib} starts. That said, there is no harm, from an \textit{ihtiyat} perspective, to wait for the disappearance of that glow from the East, but it is not essential.

32. \textit{Maghrib} time could extend to midnight, i.e. between sunset and dawn. There are though some exceptions. Women in \textit{haydh} could delay prayer until after midnight till dawn. So do the person who has been asleep all the time and that who forgot about saying the prayer.

However, the ideal time span for \textit{maghrib} starts with the start of its time and ends with the early part of the night, i.e. with the disappearance of twilight. The disappearance of the twilight should be complete after roughly one hour of sunset.

33. In the event of delaying \textit{maghrib} until just before midnight, so much so that there is only time for performing four ruku', it is obligatory to defer maghrib and say isha" instead. Should there be ample time to accommodate saying five ruku', maghrib should be performed, to be immediately followed by isha'.

34. There is a voluntary prayer that goes hand in hand with maghrib. It consists of two prayers of two-rak'a each with the niyyah of qurbah. However, one can confine it to only one two-rak'a prayer.

35. The time for this prayer goes in tandem with that of its sister, maghrib prayer. It is obligatory to delay it until one has finished maghrib. Its ideal time though is that of its sister, maghrib.

Isha' Prayer and its Voluntary Sister

36. This is the fifth and last of the obligatory daily prayers. It consists of four ruku'.

37. Its format is similar to that of dhuhr, in that the niyyah of qurbah should be identified as saying isha'. The other difference is that the recitation of the two surahs in the first two ruku' should be audible.

38. The time for isha' prayer starts with sunset till midnight, i.e. the same as that of maghrib. However, one should not say it before maghrib. Should a person do so deliberately, their prayer is deemed batil. They should, therefore, say maghrib followed by isha'.

If a person inadvertently or through ignorance said isha' before maghrib, they are not required to repeat it, regardless of whether they performed it at the start of the time or half way through it. They should therefore say maghrib only.

39. Should a person embark on isha' prayer in the belief that he has already said maghrib, then realized this was not the case, he must immediately change his niyyah to that of praying maghrib and finish it thus. Afterwards, he should say isha' . The only exception is the situation where the worshipper has passed the point in prayer where taking remedial action is not feasible, i.e. going into the fourth ruku' . In such a case, they must start both the prayers afresh.

Isha' prime time is the first third of the night. Should this time be up before the worshipper could say the prayer, they would miss the extra reward. However, they would not be deemed guilty as long as they say it before midnight.

40. After isha' prayer the worshipper can say a two-ruku' voluntary prayer from a sitting position. Bending for ruku' would be considered as good as an ordinary ruku' . However, this prayer would count as one ruku' because it is said while the worshipper is seated. Its time span is that of isha' , and so long as the worshipper can perform it after isha' and before midnight, it should be accepted by Allah, the Exalted.

Night Prayer

41. Night prayer, or salatul lail, is very highly meritorious. It consists of six prayers, the first four of which comprise two ruku' ; the fifth prayer also has two ruku and called shafti whereas the sixth has one ruku and called watr. Accordingly, the total ruku' of this prayer is eleven. However, if they so wish, the worshipper may confine it to shafi‘ and watr or to watr only.

42. The time span of this prayer starts from midnight, as has already been discussed in para. (32), to fajr, when the time for subh or fajr prayers sets in. However, the prime time for night prayer is the last third of night, usually called sahar [in Arabic].

It is to be noted, though, that no crime be committed for not observing those voluntary prayers. That said, observing them should carry great favour with Allah, the Most High.

2. Juma' Prayer

43. Juma' prayer is amongst the greatest of Islam's observances. Allah says in the Holy Qur'an, "O you who believe! when the call for prayer on Friday is made, hasten to the remembrance of Allah and leave off trading; that is better for you, if you know". (9/62).

It has been related from Imam As-Sadiq (a. s.) , "Allah shall spare the body of the believer, who had set foot in pursuit of [observing] Juma [prayer], from Hellfire".

Juma' prayer could supersede dhuhr prayer as will be discussed. Allah, the Most High, has put it in a sepestate category to distinguish it from the other prayers, in that He made it obligatory that it should be said in context of a congregational prayer. He ordained that one should be held in any one area, that everybody should be expected to attend, except for a valid reason.
Thus, it can be said that Juma' is a weekly gathering for the worshippers and the faithful, that starts with preaching and dissemination of education and knowledge through the two sermons and ends with devotion and seeking audience with Allah through the prayer itself.

The format of the prayer is identical to that of subh, except for the niyyah. However, it may diverge from subh, in that it is mustahab to perform two qunoots, the first before the first ruku' and the second after going into an upright position after the second ruku'. In order for it to be accepted, Juma' prayer has to be observed within the following framework:

Conditions for Observing Juma' Prayer

44. a. It has to be held congregationally. Accordingly, for Juma' prayer to be performed correctly, all the conditions of a congregational prayer have to be fulfilled, as will be discussed in detail.

45. b. The number of worshippers should not be less than five including the imam. Thus, any smaller number would not be sufficient to hold it; instead they can say dhuhr prayer.

46. c. Juma' prayer must be preceded by two sermons by the imam; the bare minimum of these sermons could be that the imam standing up to address the worshippers by chanting the praise of the Almighty, enjoining God-fearing, and reciting a surah from the Holy Book.

That done, he should retire for a short time, only to stand again for the second sermon. After praising Allah and thanking Him for His graces, he should invoke peace to be with Mohammad and the Imams of Muslims, and ask forgiveness for the believers.

After that, the prayer should be held. The imam must raise his voice so that those present can hear him. Insofar as the sermon is concerned, it is not a condition that only Arabic be used albeit it is preferable, as a matter of voluntary precaution; that said, any Qur'anic quotations have to be in Arabic. Should the audience not be conversant with Arabic, the imam may resort to the language they understand.

47. There should not be another Juma' prayer held in the same vicinity, i.e. within a radius of roughly five and a half km. Should there be two Juma' prayers, i.e. within the same neighbourhood, both will be deemed batil, if they were started at the same time. In the event of one of them starting where the first had finished, the one started later will be deemed batil. However, if one of the two prayers has been deemed batil, for any reason, it should not affect the outcome of the other prayer.

However, there may be a case for two Juma' prayers that were held in a prohibited proximity, as has already been explained, without any of the two congregations knowing. Both the prayers are in order, irrespective of whether they finished at the same time or having started at different times and finished at the same time.

Rules of Juma' Prayer

48. Holding Juma' prayer becomes an absolute obligation in the presence of a just ruler, i.e., in the person of the Imam or his representative. By "just ruler", we mean the person or persons who legitimately rule and uphold justice and fairness between the ruled.

49. Should there be no just ruler, holding Juma' prayer is obligatory too. However, its being obligatory is a matter of choice to start with; and its being obligatory as a matter of necessity to finish with. That is, the worshipers have to observe the obligation at midday of Juma', either by holding Juma' prayer in congregation according to the aforesaid conditions or by holding dhuhur prayer. However, whichever prayer the worshipper performed, it will suffice. That said, holding Juma' prayer is more superior and more meritorious. Saying that holding Juma' prayer as a matter of fixed obligation may have a justification.

50. Five worshippers may choose to hold Juma' prayer pursuant to the second rule. Among them there may exist a person who is known to be of an unblemished character and thus fit to deliver the sermon and lead the prayer. Should such a prayer be held, it becomes absolutely obligatory on all worshippers to attend and take part in it. This is because holding it has come about as a response to the call for Juma' prayer which must be answered. This is the third rule.

51. The following categories of worshippers may be excused of holding Juma' prayer in the light of the third rule:

a. Those whose attending the prayer may cause them undue difficulty, harm, or put them in an untenable situation.

b. The blind.
c. The sick.
d. Women.
e. The elderly.
f. The traveller whose journey justifies his saying his prayer qasr.
g. Those who live 8-10 kms. away from the place where the prayer is held.

All such people are exempt from attending and taking part in Juma' prayer thus described. However, should they choose to take part in it, it will be in order.

Should those, described in point (g), choose to travel to the place where Juma' prayer is held, they have to take part in it.

52. When the call for Juma' prayer is initiated, those who are obligated within the duty of attending the prayer are not justified in carrying on with trade or work or any other business which may hold them back from performing it. However, if the nature of business does not constitute such a barrier, there is no harm in it.

54. Just as it is obligatory to attend Juma' prayer and take part in it pursuant to the third rule, so is it obligatory to attend the two sermons and be attentive to what is being preached. Should a person become lethargic and not attend in good time for the sermon as well as the prayer itself, so much so that they missed the sermon, it shall be accepted.

55. The time span for Juma' prayer is from the beginning of noon. As a matter of ihtiyat and pursuant to what is lawfully required, those holding it should not delay it beyond noon, or zawaal, any longer. It should be performed within the boundaries of the prime time of dhuhr prayer. Better still, it should be held in the earlier part of the time span. That is, despite the fact that the time for Juma' prayer extends from zawaal till the time for asr prayer.

Ostensibly, delivering the two sermons before zawaal is not permitted.

56. Should the worshipper miss Juma' prayer, they are not justified in holding it, even though its time has not elapsed. Instead, they must say dhuhr prayer.

1. Code of Practice

The worshipper has to observe a voluntary etiquette called for in performing the obligatory daily prayers. However, they cannot be held accountable should they choose not to observe the said rituals which are of two types. The first is performed before starting prayer and the second after it is done with. The first consists of adhan and iqamah and the second consists of supplication (ta'qeeb). We shall discuss these in some detail later on.

1. Adhan and Iqamah

57. Linguistically, adhan is informing. Technically, it is a specific liturgy, heralding the onset of time for prayer. Thus, there is an informative type of adhan, letting the worshippers know that it is time for prayer; it is mustahab, irrespective of whether or not the person announcing it wanted to pray. There is another adhan with which one inaugurates prayer, which is again mustahab for the person intending to say prayer, regardless of the point in time within the time span they wanted to start it.

58. Linguistically, iqamah has many connotations, one of which is promotion. Technically, it is a procedure applied immediately before the start of the actual prayer, including the announcement that, "Prayer has begun".

The Components of Adhan and Iqamah

59. Adhan consists of eighteen parts:

Allahu Akbar, (Allah is greater). four times

Ashhadu alla ilaha illalallah, (I bear witness that there is no god but Allah), twice.

Ashhadu anna Muhammadan rasulullah, (I bear witness that Muhammad is the Messenger of Allah), twice.

Hayya alas salah, (Hasten to prayer), twice.

Hayya alal falah, (Hasten to salvation), twice.

Hayya ala khayril amal, (Hasten to the most noble of actions), twice.
Allahu Akbar, (Allah is greater), twice.

La ilaha illallah, (I bear witness that there is no god but Allah), twice.

However, there is no harm in confining the above utterances to one time each, in case one is in a hurry.

60. Iqamah has a lot in common with adhan; these are the utterances of iqama Ashhadu alla ilaha illallah, (I bear witness that there is no god but Allah), twice).

Allahu Akbar, (Allah is greater). four times

Ashhadu anna Muhammadan rasulullah, (I bear witness that Muhammad is the Messenger of Allah), twice.

Hayya alas salah, (Hasten to prayer), twice.

Hayya alal falah, (Hasten to salvation), twice.

Hayya ala khayril amal, (Hasten to the most noble of actions), twice.

Qad qamatis salah, (Prayer has begun), twice.

Allahu Akbar, (Allah is greater), twice.

La ilaha illallah, (I bear witness that there is no god but Allah), once.

According to shari'a law, the formats of both adhan and iqamah are what we have appended above. It is, therefore, not permissible for the worshipper to add anything more as though it were part of the said formats. However, any inadvertent words, i.e. not a deliberate ploy by the worshipper to give the impression that it is part thereof, can be tolerated. Yet, as a matter of ihitiyat, it is advisable to abandon it in iqamah.

Requirements of Adhan and Iqamah

There is a number of conditions that must be met in adhan and iqamah:

61. a. The niyyah of qurbah, because both, i.e. adhan and iqamah, are acts of worship.

62. b. Adhan should precede iqamah, in that should iqamah be recited first, it should be deemed in order whereas the adhan not.

63. c. The order of the utterances detailed in both the adhan and the iqamah should be adhered to. Should the worshipper make a mistake by reciting one line prematurely, they should make remedial action by reverting to the proper order.

64. d. Sequential implementation of each and every part of both the adhan and the iqamah is a must. There should also not be a pause between iqamah and prayer. A break between adhan and iqamah can be tolerated, especially in view of the fact that it is mustahab to perform a two-rak'a voluntary prayer, or any other devotion, between the two.

65. e. The setting in of prayer time, in that reciting them before the time has come is not in order. The only exception is adhan of fajr, i.e. it can be embarked on before the actual time of the Fajr prayer itself, provided that this does not entail misleading others [into believing that fajr prayer has come]. However, it should be repeated when the actual time sets in.

66. f. Both the adhan and iqamah must be recited in classical Arabic.
67. It is a prerequisite that the worshipper is in a state of taharah while reciting iqamah; they should set their face in the direction of qiblah while in a standing posture. These requirements are mustahab in adhan. It is makrouh to engage in ordinary conversation during adhan and iqamah. This becomes even more makrouh when the caller of iqamah recites, "Prayer has begun".

Adhan or iqamah by a woman is not good enough for a man, even if they are related to one another, as a matter of obligatory ihitiyat. The same rule applies in the case of an insane person and a boy not capable of rational action.

Prayers Which Require Adhan and Iqamah

68. It is mustahab for the worshipper, engaged in performing the five obligatory daily prayers, to recite adhan and iqamah for each and every prayer whether it is performed ada', or qadha', be him healthy or sick, man or woman, staying put or travelling. The recommendation to recite them becomes even more emphatic for men in particular. Shari'a has placed special emphasis on iqamah, i.e. more than adhan.

69. There should be no adhan or iqamah for voluntary prayers, such as the prayer for portents (ayat) and The two Eids prayers.

When should Adhan become redundant?

The importance of adhan diminishes in a number of cases:

70. When the worshipper hears another adhan; however, if they choose to recite adhan there is no harm in that.
71. b. Should the worshipper embark on saying a number of prayers by way of qadha' in one session, they are free to recite one adhan throughout. They have to recite iqamah for each and every prayer. That said, if they choose to recite adhan for each and every prayer, this is good enough.

72. c. The worshipper may choose to say two prayers, such as dhuhr and asr after zawaal, or maghrib and isha' after sunset. One adhan for both the prayers would suffice. Should they choose to recite adhan for the second prayer, there is no harm in that. However, the only exceptions to this routine are the combined prayers of dhuhr and asr at Arafat and the combined maghrib and isha' prayers at Muzdelifah on the eve of Eidul Adhha. The mukallaf should though be mindful of their obligation when combining Juma' prayer with asr and avoid reciting adhan for asr prayer, in that the adhan for Juma' prayer would suffice.

When should adhan and iqamah become redundant?

73. In a congregational prayer, one adhan and one iqamah by the imam or any of the worshippers would suffice, i.e. the worshippers taking part in the prayer need not recite either.

74. On entering a place where congregational prayer is either still in progress or has just finished, the worshipper can say their prayer without the need for either adhan or iqamah. That is, as long as the participants in that prayer have not dispersed. It is irrelevant too if the worshipper joined in the prayer as an imam or one of those following the imam, or said their prayer alone.

That said, should the worshipper choose to recite adhan and iqamah, they are free to do so, provided they do not contravene the code of conduct, in that they should respect the atmosphere of congregational prayer. However, it is highly recommended, as a matter of ih tiy ay, that they refrain from reciting adhan.

75. Should the mukallaf say his prayer without adhan or iqamah, this would not detract from the prayer; and they would not incur any penalty. In case they start their prayer and remember at some stage that they did not recite adhan and iqamah, they need not cut short the prayer to recite them. However, they would be justified in taking remedial action, if they remembered in the first ruku, provided that it is done before actually going to ruku.

The same thing applies in the case of forgetting the iqamah; nonetheless, this should apply even after performing ruku in both the cases, i.e. adhan and iqamah or iqamah only. Cutting short one's prayer for the sake of upholding these two devotions or either is called for.

b. Supplications

It is mustahab to invoke Allah's mercy after prayer has been said. This may take different forms, some of which could be chanting the praise of the Almighty and thanking Him for His bounties; chanting his praise in the way Fatimah, daughter of the Prophet (s. a. w), used to do could be another route; this entails saying (Allahu Akbar) 34 times, (Alhamdu Lillah) 33 times, and (Subhanallah) 33 times.

Imam Mousa Al-Kadhim (a. s.), was quoted as saying, "Any believer going about observing an act of worship, as ordained by Allah, should be rest assured that their prayer would be answered".

Among the mustahab things in the supplications after prayers is the recitation of Suratul Fatiha and the ayah of al-Kursi.

In an authentic hadith from Imam Al-Baqir (a. s.), it has been related that he said, "The bare minimum of supplication after the obligatory prayer is saying: O Allah! I ask You of all the grace You know, and seek refuge with You from all the evil You know . O Allah! I ask You to bestow favour on me in all my affairs, and seek refuge with You from the shame of this world and the torment of the hereafter".

2. The Time of Prayer

76. Embarking on prayer before its prescribed time is not allowed; nor can assuming or thinking that the time has come be tolerated. Should this happen, the worshipper must make sure that the actual time for prayer has set in, then say their prayer.

77. From a shari'a viewpoint determining the exact prayer time could be achieved by any of the following:

a. First hand knowledge.

b. Indisputable evidence.

c. The adhan of the caller to prayer, provided they are knowledgeable and of an upright character.
d. The testimony of a person who is both knowledgeable and of unblemished character.

78. Suppose that a person said his prayer in the knowledge that prayer time has come in the light of one of the aforesaid ways. On finishing prayer he discovered that the time has not started yet. What should he do?

A. If the whole prayer was over and done with outside the prescribed time, it would not count. Should the appointed time set in while the person is still praying, even if he is in the concluding part thereof, i.e., tasleem, it would count as a fully-fledged prayer.

79. Someone may say his prayer without making sure that prayer time has started. He realized that the time has actually started. His prayer is good enough. However, should he realize that the time has set in while he is still praying or after he has finished it, such a prayer is batil (invalid).

80. On finishing his prayer, a person could not determine whether he had said it on time or before it. Such a prayer would not suffice, especially determining the actual time for prayer was still a matter for debate at that moment in time.

81. Should there be not enough time left for saying prayer within its time span, the person is not justified in delaying it. He should therefore hasten to say it in its entirety within the approved time span.

However, should the person keep putting off prayer or forgetting about it to the extent that only a very short time is left to perform one ruku’, which could on average be done in one minute, he should hasten to say prayer.

If there was not enough time left even to perform one ruku', albeit in a shortened form, prayer time is deemed as though it has come to an end. Thus, saying it turns from ada' to qadha'.

82. For a good reason, the person may not be in a position to say his prayer at the earlier part of its time. Can he embark on prayer at the earlier segment of time, although he may perform it in a kneeling position, or with najasah, for example? Or should he wait until just before the end of the period to allow for the possibility of alleviating his position to say the prayer while he is in good shape?

A. People with valid reason can embark on prayer at its earliest possible time. This is so even if there was a possibility that their situation might improve with time. Should the reason for saying prayer in not an ideal enough form be lifted while time is not up, they do not have to repeat their prayer. That is so, provided that the state the person were experiencing did not entail encroaching upon an essential part (rukn) of the prayer.

83. The worshippers can, at the start of the time of an obligatory prayer, say any voluntary or compensatory (qadha') prayers before they embark on the obligatory prayer. That is, so long as they are absolutely sure that they would be able to perform the obligatory prayer after that in the form it has been ordained.

However, it is mustahab to hasten to prayer at its prime time because doing so is more superior and more meritorious. The best of times in which to perform an obligatory prayer is the closest to the start of its time span, thus allowing for its twin voluntary prayer, should it have one, to be said.

3. Number of Ruku's

84. We have already mentioned that the total number of ruku's of the five obligatory daily prayers is seventeen and the total number of ruku's of the eighteen optional prayers is thirty-four.

The total number of ruku's [of the obligatory prayers] is ordained on the mukallaf who is at home, i.e. not on journey. Thus, those at home should say dhur, asr, and isha four ruku' each; it is called tamam prayer. Should the worshipper embark on a legitimate journey, the obligatory four-rak'a prayers would be reduced to two-rak'a ones; a number of voluntary prayers would no longer be required.

Accordingly, a traveller should say dhuhr with two ruku' in the same way they says Subh; the same goes for asr and isha'. This is called qasr prayer, for Allah says, "And when you journey in the earth, there is no blame on you if you shorten the prayer." (4/101) There is no qasr in maghrib and subh.

That said, we turn now to discussing what we mean by those at 'home' who are required to say the four-rak'a prayers fully (tamam); then the nature of travel which entails qasr prayer; and the rules of qasr prayer which emanate from a legitimate travel.

Those at 'home'
85. Presence is an opposite state of travel. It means that the individual is present at their place of domicile. What we mean by 'home' is town, village, etc where the person lives, in the following sense:

Classification of 'home'

86. a. Historically, the town where the person's parents and family live and where they were born, is 'home'. It therefore follows that they should say dhuhr, asr, and isha prayers in full. That is, irrespective of whether they are still residing there or moved out to live somewhere else, so long as there is even the slightest possibility of returning to live there one day. Should the person decide not to return to live in their original town, they are no longer required to say their prayer, on visiting it, in full. They should instead pray gusr.

78. b. Once a person moves to a new town and takes it for a lifetime residence, they should say their prayer in full. The same ruling applies to the person's spouse and their dependants.

88. c. In the event of a person taking a town for residence for a long period of time, which cannot be treated as a journey, such as a student enrolling in a university away from their home town, they should say their prayer in full. The same applies to their spouse and dependants.

89. d. Anyone, who does not fit any of the previous three cases, decides to take as home anywhere, that neighbourhood or town would become their 'home'. They, their spouse and dependants should say their prayer in full. The most appropriate example one can think of in this regard is an employee in a company which decides to relocate; thus choosing to stick by his employer and move house to a different town.

So long as the person is within the boundaries of his 'home', he is required to say his prayer in full.

Should he embark on a journey, it is obligatory on him to say his prayer qasr according to the following guidelines:

90. A person may have two 'homes'.

Examples:

a. A student moving house to spend some five years working for their degree in town (x), only to return to his home town on completion of his study. So, both places are now considered his 'home'.

b. A business person moves between their residence in their home town and his holiday home, at summer resort (x), spending in the process five months of the year in the latter and the remaining months in his home town residence. He has to say his prayer in full, [i.e. without the concession of qasr for a traveller].

c. A person may have two residences in two different towns, such as one who has two wives, spending one week here and the other there so long as he lived or stayed thus indefinitely.

91. A person may have a 'home' fitting the description of any of the four categories already discussed. Should he become undecided as to relinquishing it, this does not render that 'home' as non-existent.
92. You may pose the question that many people choose to migrate to far away lands in pursuit of either lawful work or study. Should those people, who stay years on end in their adoptive country, say their prayers in full, or should they be allowed to say them qasr?

A. Should the immigrants decide not to return to their native country, they must act as though the country they immigrated to is their homeland, in that they should say their prayers in full. That is, irrespective of whether they decided to stay for a long or a short period of time. Thus, their adoptive country becomes their 'home', i.e. of the fourth category already discussed under 92 (d).

If the immigrants did not contemplate the idea of not returning to their homeland, their situation would be determined by the length of time they intend to stay in the second country. Should the period of their stay be, say, four years or more, the second country would be deemed as 'home'. Thus, they will be required to say their prayers in full. Their new 'home' would be of the third category (91. c) already discussed.

If the period of their stay be shorter, i.e. one or two years, the second country would not count as 'home'. It will be treated as any country other than their own. Accordingly, their religious duty is to say their prayers in full; that is if their travel fits the definition which will be discussed in paras. (168) onward of this Section. Otherwise, their obligation will be qasr. However, if the stay was for two years, the ruling regarding it as a 'home' could also cover it.
Requirements of Lawful Travel

By 'lawful travel' we mean that kind of travel which warrants saying the four- rak'a prayer qasr (shortened). However, qasr would not come about if the travel did not satisfy the following:

93. a. The distance covered in a journey should not be less than eight farsakh, (i.e. roughly forty three and one fifth km). Whether this distance is covered in one direction or in both directions is immaterial. That is, it may cover the outward and the return journeys. The other thing which does not affect the result is the time spent in travelling, i.e. be it few minutes, hours, or days. The periphery of the town, be it big or small, should be taken as a point for calculating the distance.

94. b. The entire distance should be in the mind of the travelling person, i.e. until it is all covered.

Example 1: If a passenger was either asleep or unconscious during the trip so much so that they were not aware that they were travelling, such a journey is of no consequence.

Example 2: A person headed towards a point which covers half of the distance in question. Upon reaching their destination, they had second thoughts about going further, thus covering, say the second half of the distance. So long as the entire distance was not intended to be covered at the outset, such a travel is of no consequence, although they covered the entire distance.

Example 3: The same ruling applies to a person intending to cover the entire distance, yet while en-route, i.e. half way, they became reluctant whether to carry on with their journey. Such a person will not be allowed to say their prayer qasr, even if they covered the whole distance at that lethargic pace. This is so because there was no continuity in their intention to complete the journey to their intended destination.

By 'intention' we mean not only the individual's desire and choice, but their unwavering feeling that they are going to cover the entire distance. That is, irrespective of whether this feeling had emanated from their own free will to travel, or they were coerced, or had no choice.

95. c. Covering the distance should be in accordance with established practice (urf), in that it should be widely held that whomsoever covered it, it cannot be said that they do not come under the banner of 'traveler'. For example, if one chooses to jog some hundred meters away from their home, going in circles, and covering in the end the entire distance of over forty three km; such should not qualify for the definition of 'traveler'.

d. Nothing of the following should occur to the traveller before covering the said distance:

96. a. Passing through one's 'home'. Should the traveller get passed their 'home', or any other place they consider 'home', before completing the distance of just over forty three km, this would not count as a journey because it was interrupted by passing through one's 'home', before exhausting the whole distance.
97. b. Staying at any place on the way for a month before completing the entire distance - of just over forty three km. That is, regardless of whether the traveller intended, at the outset, to stay for a month, or kept delaying their departure many times on end for this reason or the other.

The one month mentioned here should be thirty days. Thus, any lunar month consisting of less than thirty days would not do.

98. c. Staying at a place en-route for ten days before covering the whole distance. Here the traveller must stay the entire period of ten days, having made up their mind on arrival at that place. The decision to stay the course for ten days is akin to staying thirty days without the intention to do so. [To sum up], any stay of ten days, so described, takes place in a journey [intended to] cover the whole distance, yet stops short of completing it, has no bearing from a sharia viewpoint.

Jurists call "passing through one's 'home'", "staying at any place on the way for a month before completing the entire distance", and "staying at a place en-route for ten days before covering the whole distance", [which appear under paras (96,a), (97,b), and (98,c) [the disrupters of travel.

Thus, the fourth of the characteristics of 'lawful travel' is that any of these 'disrupters' should not take place during the journey before the entire distance is covered.

So long as these four conditions are met, prayers have to be said qasr. However, some types of travel are exempt as will be discussed in paras (158) onward.

Additional Details and Applications Concerning the General Requirements

The First Requirement

99. Insofar as the first of the requirements is concerned, i.e., covering the distance, one may pose the following questions:

Is there any difference between covering the distance horizontally, like travelling on land, and vertically, such as in the case of air travel?

A. There is no difference between the two cases, provided that in the case of air travel, the traveller is not said to be still in the air space of their 'home'.

100. Should you cover the required distance, of just over forty three km., not necessarily in a straight line, would the traveller in this case qualify for qasr prayers?

A. Yes, they would. For example, suppose the 'home' of the traveller is located on the periphery of a circle, the distance of which, apart from what their 'home' occupies, is equal to the required distance for travel. Should they embark on walking the distance on route of the circle, this would suffice.

101. Should a person cover the required distance to and fro, i.e., by way of repeating a given segment of say five km. many times until the entire distance is covered, would they qualify for qasr prayers?

A. This does not count as a lawful travel and thus does not qualify for qasr prayers.

102. Suppose the road between two towns is not straight because of the terrain; it may twist and turn, etc. Should the required distance, for a return journey on such a road, be calculated as though it was a straight line?

A. . . No, the actual distance, including the twists and turns, should count, as long as the traveller covered it in the usual way, i.e. as everyone else does.

103. Suppose there were two villages in a mountainous terrain, one the top of mountain, and the other at its foot. The road linking the two villages twists and turns. Drawing a straight nominal line between the two destinations will tell us that it falls far short of the shari'ī distance. What is the criterion?

A. The criterion is that you calculate what the traveller covers of the actual road distance, including the twists and turns, should this be the usual route people take to get to either village.

104. Should you travel from your 'home' to another town and back, covering in the process the required distance of just over forty three km, you have to say your prayers qasr. This is because a return journey is considered one, unless it is interrupted by one of the 'disrupters' of travel mentioned in paras. (98 to 100), in that should you choose to stay in the other town ten days and return home after that, no qasr must ensue.
105. Suppose there are two routes to get to the second town, one is shorter than the other?

A. The traveller may choose the longer route which may constitute two thirds of the required distance, on the outward and the return journeys. They may have as well used the longer route for one leg of the journey and used the shorter route, which may constitute one third of the required distance, for, say, the return journey. In such a case, they qualify for qasr prayers. Should they choose to use the shorter of the two routes for the outward journey as well as the return one, no qasr prayers shall be allowed.

106. Suppose the traveller used one route for their outward journey and did not make up their mind as to the route they were going to use on the return journey, what should they do?

A. Should they use the longer route for the outward journey, they have to qualify for qasr prayers, so long as they were intent on using one of the two routes on their return journey. If they used the shorter of the two routes for the outward journey, and were undecided as to the route they were going to use on the return journey, no qasr prayer is allowed, although they might have made up their mind as to choosing the longer route on return.

Should one of the routes represent half the distance and the other one quarter, what is the ruling?

A. If the traveller used the longer route for their outward as well as return journey, it is obligatory on them to say their prayers qasr. Should they choose to use the shorter of the two routes, for both legs of the journey or for at least one of them, no qasr prayers should be performed. The same ruling applies, if they used the longer route for the outward journey and were not sure as to which of the two routes they were going to use for the return journey. That is, even if they later on resolved the matter and decided to use the longer route on return.

107. A traveller may cover the required distance, of just over forty three km., in order to get to their intended destination. It may just happen that another traveller embarks on a journey just for the sake of driving a car to test its reliability. Does the same ruling apply to both the travellers?

A. Yes, the same ruling applies to both of them, in that they both should say their prayers qasr.

108. Determining the [shari'i] distance can be achieved in a variety of ways. First hand knowledge is one of them. The testimony of two witnesses of impeccable character is another. Through the report of a knowledgeable trustworthy person is a third. If any of these is hard to come by, the traveller should maintain full prayer (tāmam). The same ruling applies in case of contradictory testimonies.

109. The traveller is not required to gauge the distance for himself to ascertain that he really covered the forty three and one fifth km. So long as he relied on one of the aforementioned ways, [i.e. in para. 110], he is allowed to say his prayer qasr. Again, if he does not come by any of them and remained doubtful, he must say his prayer in full.
110. If while en-route a traveller realized that the distance he is covering is equal to that required by law (shari'a), he should say his prayer qasr. That is, even only if a short distance is left to cover the entire distance. This is because what is of value is the start of the distance at the outset not when he came to know that it was equal to the required distance.

111. Should a traveller say his prayers qasr relying on one of the ways of determining the required distance, then realized he was wrong, his qasr prayers are null and void; thus, he has to repeat them in full.

112. On the understanding that he does not cover the entire distance in his trip, a traveller said his prayer in full (tayammum). In another case, he may have done so, in the light of the above-mentioned para. (111), out of doubt. The contrary was proved, in that he found out that he covered the entire distance as prescribed by law. In this case, he should repeat his prayers by way of qasr, should there still be time for that.

The Second Requirement

113. Insofar as the second of the requirements is concerned, i.e. the intended distance, you may pose the following questions:

Setting out on a journey, the travellers had no idea how far away their intended destination was. While en-route they found out that the distance warrants qasr prayers. How should they go about it?

A. They should say their prayers qasr. This is because what is of importance is the intention to get to one's destination, covering the distance, regardless of whether or not they are going to achieve that.

114. Should their aim be to travel to a destination which falls short of covering the entire distance, and upon reaching it, they decided to go further, what should they do?

A. . . This is considered as though they have just started their journey, i.e., the calculation of distance should start from the time and place they decided to continue their journey to a new destination. All the distance they covered before should not count. Now, if the total of the new distance and back would be equal to the required distance, they should say their prayers qasr. That is, provided that none of the 'disrupters' of travel did arise en-route.

Example:

A person decided to travel from their 'home' to a destination, the distance of which constitutes one third of the required distance. Upon getting there, he decided to go to another place, the distance of which again constitutes one third; he further decided that to return home by the same route. Accordingly, the total distance covered will equal the required distance, i.e., one third for the outward journey and two thirds for the return one. Here, the person should say his prayer qasr.

115. Those who are in pursuit of things, such as a lost animal, pasture [for their animal to graze], and the tramp, are required to say their prayer in full.

116. The person may be intent on making the journey; yet they are not sure whether they are going to cover the entire distance, for this reason or the other. In such a case, the intention is deemed non-existent and thus qasr prayers shall not be in order. That is, if the possibility of not completing the journey was slim.

117. Anyone making their journey contingent upon certain things, which may or may not happen, are treated as though they are not serious in the first place. Thus, they should be treated as though they are still at 'home'; [accordingly, they should say their prayers in full].

118. The decision to travel and cover the required distance has no bearing on the fact that it is made independently or it is one resulting from another decision, such as in the case of a wife accompanying her husband. There is also no difference between a member of a group travelling of their own accord and another traveller who is coerced to make the journey, like a soldier and a prisoner.

119. If the followers in travel are not aware of the intention of the person they are following, they should say their prayer in full, even if the journey took a long time. That is, unless while en-route they came to know of an alternative route; they should then act accordingly. In all circumstances, it is not incumbent on the followers to find out about the intention of the person they are following whether directly or indirectly.

120. If the followers harboured the intention of parting company with the person they are following at the first possible opportunity, what form should their prayers take?
A. 'Following' per se has no value at all. What is important is the intention to travel and cover the distance by any means possible. There is no doubt though that intending to break away from the person being followed runs contrary to the intention of travel. Accordingly, prayers should be said in full. That is, unless the intention of the follower is far-fetched in which case the 'intention' to travel and cover the distance exist as a matter of course. It, therefore, follows that qasr becomes obligatory.

121. The travellers may aim for a destination, between which and their 'home' is the required distance, then change their mind and go to another destination which is away from their 'home' by the same distance. This shift does not detract from the original intention of travel. Accordingly, they should remain committed to praying qasr.

The same applies in the case of the travellers intending to travel to one of any two destinations, without necessarily identifying which one he is intending to go to. That is, as long as both the destinations are located on the same required distance away from the traveller's 'home'.

122. They may embark on an intended travel. After covering some distance, they wavered for a while only to resolve the matter by reinforcing their original intention. Should they say their prayer in full or qasr?

A. If they did not cover any segment of the road while still wavering, they can stick with qasr, even if what is left of the distance does not amount to the lawful distance. Indeed, the same applies even if they covered any stretch of the road.

They may decide not to continue the journey, only to abrogate this decision by going back to their original intention and continued the journey. Should they, [during the decision making time], remain in the same place en-route, i.e. without returning, and resumed their journey there and then, it is obligatory on them to say their prayer qasr.

If they turned back and walked [or drove] few miles, only to change their mind again and resume travel, the distance already covered will not count towards the calculation of the required distance. They have to start calculating it from the place they resumed their journey. If the remaining distance, together with the distance which will be covered on the return journey, does amount to the required distance, qasr is the norm; otherwise, they have to say their prayer in full (tamam).

The Fourth Requirement

123. Insofar as the third requirement, considering the covering of the distance according to the established practice (urf), as travel, one could pose the following questions:

In metropolitan cities, one can cover the required distance, from their 'home' to any other district in it and back, i.e. without even going out of boundaries of the city. Does such a travel warrant qasr?

A. Such a travel does not fit the definition of 'travel', because moving around in one's city, irrespective of its sprawling suburbia, does not amount to a journey; 'travel' should entail being away from one's 'home'.
124. On the way between town (a) and town (b) there may be other towns. The distance between the two towns is equal to that of the lawful distance. Should a person travel from their town (a) to town (b), they must say their prayer qasr.

These towns may expand. What should the worshippers do?

A. They should say their prayers qasr, unless the expansion of, and the interaction between, these towns were such that they form one sprawling metropolis, according to urf. This will be discussed further under para. (175) onward.

The Fourth Requirement

125. Insofar as the fourth requirement, concerning the 'disrupters' of travel, is concerned, you may ask:

The persons may be intent on staying at their 'home', which is on route to their final destination. However, due to unforeseen circumstances, they could not. Thus, they covered the entire distance as required by law. Do they have to say their prayers qasr?

A. They should not, because of their intention to stop on the way at their 'home'. Since staying or stopping at 'home' is considered one of the 'disrupters' of a journey, they were not determined to cover the entire distance of the journey at the outset. Thus, they lack the second of the four requirements.

126. What about the person who, when deciding on embarking on a journey, were not sure whether they were going to stop at their 'home'?

A. Such persons do not qualify for qasr prayers for the same reason [discussed in the previous answer]

127. A person on a journey not knowing whether, while on the way, he is going to stay ten days at a place, or one month without the intention of staying that long, before completing the whole distance. While still en-route, they dropped the idea of stopping on the way and thus stayed the whole course. What should they do?

A. They have to say their prayer qasr. The same ruling applies in the case of the travellers deciding to stay at a place on the way for ten days, should they change their mind and continue their journey to his final destination.

128. Likewise, if on reaching a certain location on the way, they fancied the idea of staying for ten days only to drop it and complete their journey, i.e. qasr prayers should be the norm.

When does qasr start and when does it end?

We already know that when 'travel' fulfills the four requirements, it becomes obligatory that the worshipper say their prayers qasr.

So, when should the traveller begin applying qasr and when should it cease?

Let us start by the answer to the second part of the question:

1. When should qasr cease?

Qasr ceases for one of the following reasons:

a. Arriving at One's 'Home'

129. When the travellers get to their 'home' or town, their journey comes to an end. This applies to both ways, i.e. whether they started their journey from that town and returned to it or started somewhere else and ended in their town. It also applies to the traveller who adopted two towns, separated by the required distance, as their 'home'.

Travel comes to an end when the travellers enter the point on the periphery of the town where building environment and the like could be seen. Conversely, the ruling of qasr should be upheld.

130. Arriving at one's 'home' for any reason, be it to stay or just passing by, renders the concession of qasr prayers redundant. It can though be applied again when the worshippers set out on a fresh lawful journey.

If the traveller is aboard a plane that passes in the air space of their 'home', the 'travel' as such comes to an end. That is, unless the aircraft is flying on a very high altitude so much so that it is not, according to urf (established practice), considered among the air space of their home town.

131. The time, during which the traveller used to be present at their 'home', does not constitute a barrier to interrupting 'travel'. Example: A university student away from his 'home' decided to return to his original 'home' during summer recess. Should he choose to go back to the town where he is studying during summer time, his travel comes to an end on getting there.

b. Staying for a Period of Ten Days

132. Having covered the required distance, a person decided to stay at a place for ten days. He is, therefore, called 'resident'. 'Residence' brings 'travel' to an end. Accordingly, this 'resident' person has to say his prayer in full, unless he starts a new journey.

133. The decision to stay ten days should have the ingredients, on the part of the decision maker, of confidence that he really is going to stay. However, whether this confidence stemmed from his own free will, feeling that he has no choice but to stay, or for reasons beyond his control, such as in the case of a prisoner is immaterial. So, where confidence inspires certainty, or peace of mind, (Consult the meaning of 'peace of mind' and its requirements under para. '21' of the Chapter on Takkheel), this leads to the required result.

Accordingly, if the travellers wanted to stay ten days, yet they were not so sure that they would stay the whole period, or they might have anticipated an emergency, they are not considered to be 'resident's, because of the absence of certitude that they would stay.

134. By 'ten days', we mean ten days and nine nights; the nights are those which fall between the first day and the last one. The beginning of the day is dawn. So, whoever decides to stay at a place from the dawn of the first day, say, of the month to sunset of the tenth day, this will be considered 'residence'. The same applies in the case of starting the ten-day period at midday of the first day, which should end at midday of the eleventh, and so on.

The ten-day period does not have to be specific, i.e. any ten days would do.

However, should a person arrive in a town at the first night of the month and decides to stay ten nights, i.e. till the tenth night, this would not do. This is because the said period does not consist of ten days.

135. By 'staying' during the ten days, we mean that the travellers should stay overnight in that town and go about their affairs there. Also, they should not engage in any other lawful travel during that stay. However, this does not mean that they are not free to move about within the vicinity of that town and its suburbs, and even nearby towns and villages, provided that the distance separating these and the town they chose to stay does not amount the required distance [of just over forty three km].

136. By 'place of stay', we mean any particular place in a town, village, neighbourhood, etc. That is, splitting the stay, say, on two different places is not good enough. Thus, in order to interrupt 'travel' by way of 'stay', or residence, you have to be intent on spending the full ten days, or more, in one place.

137. Mere staying for ten days in one place, i.e. without the intention to do so, 'travel' will not be deemed to have been disrupted. Of the same nature too is someone contemplating staying at a place, making it contingent on, say, the hope that the cold weather is not going to worsen. Since, the weather did not worsen, they stayed the ten days. In such cases, no qasr is warranted.
The Daily Prayers

138. The obligation of prayer is not a requirement [for certain categories of people] of the ten-day period of stay. For example, if a woman in a state of haydh embarked on a journey and decided to stay for ten days, she should be described as such; she should therefore say her prayers in full once she became tahir. The same applies to a boy who has not yet attained adulthood; should he complete fifteen years of age during the ten-day period, he must say his prayers in full.

139. If the travellers, who had completed the ten-day period and thus said their prayer in full, decided to extend their stay, do they need to renew their intention to stay that extra period?

A. They should perform their prayers in full until they travel whenever they liked without the need for a new intention (niyyah).

140. On arriving at a place, a traveller did not contemplate to stay ten days; accordingly, he performed his prayers qasr. He is free to change his mind and take up the option of staying the ten-day period. However, this period should start from the day he has made up his mind; so if it was the fifth day after his arrival, this should take his stay to the fifteenth day. Thus, he can be considered a fully-fledged 'resident' and should, therefore, observe prayers in full.

Should he reach a decision during the time of dhuhur or asr prayers, it is obligatory on him to say his prayers in full (tama'am).

141. Someone reached a decision to observe the ten-day stay. Before performing either isha' or dhuhr or asr, he changed their mind. He should observe qasr prayers. However, should he change his mind after he has said any of the four-rak'a prayers in full, he should stick with saying tamam prayers, for he is not allowed to say his prayers qasr.

142. A. Traveller, who has made up his mind to observe the ten-day period, forgot about their new situation and said either isha, dhuhr or asr in full, i.e. as though they were still at home not in a travel. Would this be sufficient for them to uphold tamam prayers?

A. This should be sufficient. However, as for the prayer performed by a traveller instead of a full prayer by way of compensation, it would not do for the purpose of remaining observant of full prayers. That is, even if the compensatory prayers were for those missed during their 'stay'.

143. If certain travellers decided to observe the ten-day stay and thus said their prayer in full. Shortly afterwards, they changed their mind as to the 'stay'. However, they discovered that the prayer they performed in full was batil. In such a case, they have to revert to qasr. This is because when something is deemed batil, all its consequences are deemed void as though it did not exist at the outset.

144. A person decided to observe the ten-day stay and started saying dhuhr prayer. Halfway through prayer, he changed his mind. What should he do?

A. The answer could be one of three:

a. If the decision to changing his mind occurred during the first two ruku', he should change his niyyah (intention) to qasr and finish his prayer as such.

b. Should he change his mind after the second ruku leading to the third, but before he actually executed ruku', he should change to the niyyah of qasr. This entails cancelling the third ruku, going to a sitting position, and thus finishing the prayer.

c. If he changed his mind after executing the third ruku, their prayer would be deemed null and void (batil). He should, therefore, say it again.

145. A traveller decided to drop the idea of observing the ten-day stay. However, he was not sure whether or not he said his prayers in full, so that he can maintain them as such. He should resolve the matter by assuming that they did not. This means that he should observe qasr prayers.

c. Staying for Thirty Days

146. The third reason for 'travel' coming to an end is staying in one place for thirty days, even without the intention to do so. This situation arises when travellers arrives at their destination, not knowing when they are going to leave. If they remained undecided for thirty days, they should observe qasr prayers for all that period. Should they remain in that place beyond the thirty days, they must say their prayers in full. That is even if they decided to leave the place in an hour's time.

147. The thirty-day period should consist of thirty days and twenty nine nights which fall between the first and the last days.
148. The lunar month of less than thirty days would not do for this purpose.

149. Should the travellers be frequenting a number of proximate places or thirty days, they must observe qasr prayers, even if the distance between these places was less than the established one. That is because the 'stay' all this time was not confined to one place.

2. When should qasr start?

150. Should qasr prayers start with setting out on the journey and covering the prescribed distance, taking account of the requirements, or after the said distance has been covered?

A. The stipulation of qasr starts from the moment the traveller sets out from their 'home', or the place in which they observed the ten-day stay, or the place where they spent thirty days due to indecision. The qasr starts with the first step with which they started the journey.

However, travelling from one's 'home' has a slight variation, in that the stipulation of qasr becomes operative when the traveller is no longer visible to the naked eye from a point on the periphery of the built environment (imran).

The sight of the built environment to the traveller is immaterial here. This criterion is constant, i.e. the magnitude of the buildings has no bearing on it; this runs contrary to the fact, if qasr was linked to the disappearance of buildings because it varies according to the type of architecture in this country or that.

151. If the travellers can no longer be seen because of some sort of barrier, such as entering a tunnel, this is not sufficient for activating qasr. Qasr becomes operative only when the travellers disappear completely, in that they cannot be seen by, say, those who are bidding them farewell; and by the same token they cannot see those seeing them off. This assumes an open terrain, i.e. with no barriers; this is called had et tarakhus, i.e. the point from which the traveller is allowed to observe qasr.

152. Someone set on a journey from his home. He was not certain as to reaching had et tarakhus to pray qasr. He should uphold tamam prayer until he is sure that he had reached the point.

153. Someone embarked on a journey. After few steps, they thought that they reached had et tarakhus. He stopped to say prayer in its qasr format. Thereafter, he discovered he was wrong. What would become of his prayer?

His prayer would be batil. On reaching a conclusion that he was still short of had et tarakhus and wished to say prayer there and then, he has to say it in full. However, he is free to delay it until he has got passed had et tarakhus, in which case he can say it qasr; that is, as long as there was still ample time [for prayer].

Adjourning Travel

154. A person set out on a journey. On covering some distance, he said his prayer qasr. Shortly afterwards, he decided to cancel the journey and return home. What would become of the prayer he said by way of qasr?
A. Should the distance covered in the outward journey, to the point where the decision to cancel it was taken, and back be equal to the approved distance [of just over forty three km], he must continue to observe qasr until he returns home.

If not, he has to repeat the prayer in full and on time where possible; otherwise, at some other time as a matter of obligatory precaution.

155. Suppose he covered half the distance where he decided to stay for ten days. How should he go about his prayer?

A. He should repeat it, as has already been mentioned in the answer of the previous question.

156. A resident of town (a) decided to travel to town (b). On getting as far as town (c) which is closer to his hometown (a), he said his prayer qasr. Immediately after that, he had second thoughts whereby he decided to go to town (d) which is also on the route to his provisionally intended destination, i. e. town (b), and return home.

Now, should the total distance, i. e. to and from, between towns (a) and (d), [their new final destination], be equal to the prescribed distance, his [qasr] prayer is in order. He should, therefore, maintain qasr prayers. Conversely, he should repeat the prayer and maintain full ones.

157. The resident of town (a) already mentioned in para. (158) had a variation in his plan, in that upon getting as far as town (c), he started observing qasr prayers. Having become undecided, he remained in the latter for a month; he then continued his journey to his originally intended destination, i.e. town (b). What would become of the prayer he said \textit{qasr}?

A. He must repeat them in full (tamam).

To sum up, any person setting out on a journey, and intending to cover the whole prescribed distance [of just over forty three km]., then said \textit{qasr} prayers before any of the 'disrupters' of travel set in, it is obligatory on them to repeat their prayer in full.

Barring any 'disrupters', but prior to staying the course he changed his mind or actually returned home, he should take into account the actual distance covered and the one he decided to cover in the light of his new intention. Should they equal the prescribed distance, his \textit{qasr} prayers are in order; otherwise, he must repeat them.

\textbf{Who of the travellers is exempt?}

There are two types of travellers who cannot be covered by the concession of saying \textit{qasr} prayers. The first is he who travels in pursuit of a sinful act; the second is he whose travel is his means of earning a living.

1. \textbf{The Traveller in Pursuit of a Sinful Act}

Travelling for doing evil can be any of the following:

158. a. Any type of travel which aims to rebel against Allah's injunctions by committing that which is \textit{haraam}, such as trading in intoxicants, killing the respected soul, highway robbery, aiding a wrongdoer, or preventing someone from discharging his lawful duty.
The main aim and motivation for travel could be a lawful thing in itself, such as going on a picnic. Should a misdeed be commissioned on the way, such as lying, backbiting, or eating that which is najis, this cannot be termed as 'travel in pursuit of a sinful act'.

159. b. Any type of travel which the travellers resort to as a means of escaping from discharging a lawful obligation, such as hiding with a view to avoiding paying a debt, especially when they are in a position to do so.

160. c. The travel which is haram in itself, i.e. neither of the two previous ones, such as one making an oath that he would never travel on a rainy day, or he one that was called upon not to travel by someone whom he should not disobey because of his solemn authority. Should he go ahead and embark on the journeys so described, the journeys themselves are deemed haram and thus termed 'travel in pursuit of a sinful act'.

161. A person travelling in pursuit of a sinful act should not warrant such concession as saying qasr (shortened) prayer. Thus, he must say his prayer in full (tamam).

162. In the first two categories of such a travel, the travellers may achieve that unlawful act they set out to do and want to return. If the distance of the return journey was equal to the prescribed one, they should say their prayer qasr, irrespective of whether or not they repented. Should the distance be less than that required by Islamic law, no qasr prayer is allowed.

Should the return journey, of the third category type, entail a sinful act also, no qasr prayer is allowed. If the commissioning of the haraam act be restricted to the outward journey, the ruling concerning the first two categories applies.

163. Trips made for hunting for pleasure are treated as a kind of 'travel in pursuit of a sinful act'. However, the person involved in such a travel should say their prayer in full in the outward journey; for the return journey, qasr prayer applies, if the distance of that leg is equal to that required by law. If hunting was a source of earning a living for the person embarking on it, they are covered by the same rules applicable to those journeying in pursuit of legitimate business.

164. Any one who sets out on a lawful journey, yet he commits another unlawful act on the way, such as using a usurped means of transport or passing through a usurped land, he should say their prayer qasr.

    However, if a person usurped a car and drove off [for the required distance], as thieves do, he should say his prayer in full.

165. At its inception, travel may not be of the type that entails commissioning an unlawful act. While en-route, it could turn to be an unlawful one, such as a business man embarking on a journey to strike a deal of grain; yet he turned to dabbling in intoxicants. Such change from a lawful activity to an unlawful one could happen while on the way, but prior to completing the journey; it could also happen after staying the whole course. These two cases have two different outcomes:

    a. In the first case, the change nullifies the lawful travel; consequently, the prayer reverts to full (tamam), from a qasr
one. If the person has already said their prayer qasr, he have to repeat it in full this time round, time permitting; if not, he has to say it in full by way of qadha.

b. In the second case, the qasr prayers that have been said are deemed in order, because the lawful travel has already been initiated. Should he switch to a journey entailing committing a haraam act, they have to combine both, i.e. saying his prayers in full as well as qasr, as a matter of recommended precaution (ihityat). Thus, each of dhuhr, asr, and isha prayers has to be said once in full and a second time qasr. However, it is more likely (al-aqwa) that saying prayers in full is preferable.

166. There is though the case which is a reverse of the previous one, in that the traveller sets out intent on committing that which is haraam (unlawful), then renounces it by switching to that which is lawful. So, if the remaining distance, from where the switch took place, plus the distance of the return journey is equal to that required by law, their prayer should be qasr. It should be said in full before the switch takes place.

167. Applying the rule of qasr for the traveller embarking on a lawful journey, then switching to a lawful one should begin at the time and place of the change, without losing sight of the distance prescribed by law. That said, the rule is enforceable, even if the person concerned is still within the boundaries of the place where the change took place.

The same ruling applies to the person who went ahead and committed that which is haraam and returned home with the intention of covering the required distance [i.e., just over forty-three km]. That is, qasr prayer applies from the start of the return journey, in that it is not contingent on going out of the [boundaries] of the town.

2. The Person Whose Means of Earning a Living Entail Travelling

168. People whose job, business, or profession necessitates travelling are not permitted to say their prayers qasr. The most vivid example of such persons are the drivers of a vehicle, especially when it entails making [long] journeys. This also applies to the persons who volunteer to work as drivers for other people gratuitously.

As for the persons who drive their car for leisure [for example], they cannot be treated as though travelling is part and parcel of their job. Nevertheless, they should say their prayer in full. This is because the criterion in reaching such a ruling is the frequency of travelling.

Categories of those whose job entails travelling are:

169. a. The persons who are required to travel due to the nature of their job, such as drivers, pilots, airhost/ess, seafarers... etc.

170. b. The persons, although not required to travel as a direct result of the nature of their job, yet their job still entails some travel, which could, among other things, be called for, because they want to be away from their base to see matters for themselves directly, instead of deputizing others.
However, there are two categories of such travellers, [producing two different rulings]:

a. The destinations covered by travelling, in this category, should be dispersed or temporary which should not be considered as the traveller's 'home', already discussed in paras. (87-89). Such people should be saying their prayer in full at these destinations or on the way to them.

b. There must be a strong bond between the travelling persons and the place they are required to travel to, in that they treat it as their [second] 'home' by way of deciding to stay there, say, for a period of four years or more.

An example of such a person is a university student doing his degree away from his hometown; this has already been discussed in para; (89). Thus, such a person should say his prayer in full in his second 'home', and say it qasr while travelling to and from it, unlike the previous case. This is because travelling is not the main feature of his job.

171. We will discuss below some examples drawn from real life situations so that the worshipper may be in a position to deduce the ruling for each case:

a. A student resident of town (a) commutes daily to his place of study in town (b) which is away from his town by the required distance. His obligation is to say his prayer in full, at his residence, place of study, and on the way to and from it.

b. Doing a course of six months or one year, the same student decided to stay a week, or more, in the place where he studies before he returned to spend, say, the weekend with his family. He has to say his prayer in full at both places and on the way.

c. Should the student choose to take the place of study as a [second] 'home', for embarking on a long-term course of study of, say, four years or more, he has to say his prayer in full at the place where he studies. During his journeys, he has to observe qasr prayer, provided that the distance between the two destinations is equal to the one required by law [or more].

d. What applies to the student [in the previous examples] should apply to any other person working away from 'home'.

e. A resident engineer, in charge of a project located away from his 'home', is required to travel between his place of work and his 'home' at different intervals, which could be long or short. He should say them in full throughout, i.e. be he present at either destination or on the move.

f. Soldiers of any elk based away from their 'home' have to say their prayer in full. That is, regardless of the period of absence from 'home'. Similarly, should they be sent on a mission away from their base, whether individually or as part of a company of soldiers, they should observe prayers in full.

g. A school drop-out joined a six-month course in a learning centre located away from his 'home' by the minimum distance required by law or more. He has to say his prayer in full throughout, irrespective of whether he decided to commute regularly or make intermittent trips to and from the learning centre.

h. An engineer, doctor, administrator and the like were sent abroad for further study to widen their experience. Their absence may extend for one year. They are required to say their prayer in full at the place where they are studying or training.

i. Business men who set up a business away from their place of domicile by the same distance required by law. The nature of the business being set up requires them to be present there for a few days/weeks on end. They have to say their prayer in full, both at the place of the business and while journeying.

j. A roving inspector and the like working for a bank or a company are required to say their prayer in full while they are on the move.

k. A contractor, a tradesman, and the like, who are required to travel the full required distance between a number of towns or villages to attend to certain jobs, are required to say their prayers in full while going about their work.

172. Unlike the previous situations, where full prayers are called for, we give below some other examples, apart from (e, f, and g), where qasr prayers be the norm:

a. Technicians on a call-out type of work in a particular vicinity happened to be asked by their employer to go outside their appointed area to do a job; as a result, they had to travel to the new place whereby they covered the distance required by law. In such a case, it is obligatory on them to observe qasr prayer, because it is a one-off task.

b. A company employee's job requires them to make one or two journeys a month outside their base on duty, thus covering the required distance. Their obligation is to say prayers qasr.
c. A religious instructor who goes about his job in his hometown. He may be occasionally required to travel to other towns to deliver sermons. He must say his prayers qasr, should he cover the required distance his travel.

However, if travel was an integral part of his job such that he could be called a roving preacher, he must say his prayer in full. He should also be praying qasr, if he becomes a habitual traveller, even if these journeys teem from other things not related to his actual job.

d. Part-time taxi drivers have to say their prayer qasr, if they cover the required distance in any of their trips. This is because their original job does not entail travel and working as a driver is considered a temporary job.

If these persons embark on, say, one trip a year during which they are required to carry out very important work, such as hajj guidance, they must say their prayers in full.

e. Whomsoever becomes a habitual traveller not for business, but for leisure and voluntary devotional work, such as frequenting the holy shrines, they should observe qasr prayer. (Please see para(168).

f. Someone may mix work with pleasure, such as a painter or an artist, where they seek enjoyment by travelling from one place to the other. In the process, they earn a living from their paintings. Their obligation vis-à-vis prayers must be that they should perform them in full. This is because the criterion is the frequency of travel, albeit their prime concern is not earning a living by way of travelling.

g. Those whose job entails travelling as and when required and therefore say prayers in full are required to do likewise, when they make a journey that falls outside the requirements of their job. Example: A taxi driver taking his family on a trip to the holy shrines, he should say his prayers in full.

To sum up, any one working away from his 'home' should observe prayers in full whether during the journey to his workplace or at it. That is, if he does not take the workplace as a second home.

Should travel form an integral part of the job by the very nature of the job, he must be saying their prayer in full.

The person who is regarded as frequent traveller, although his job does not require him to travel, should also observe prayers in full.

Big and Small Towns

173. As you are already aware that (a) persons residing in their hometown are required to perform prayer in full, (b) the travelling persons deciding to stay in one place ten days are required to do the same, and (c) the travelling persons passing through their hometown must bring their journey to an end and observe prayer in full.

All of that may pose the question:

Where should one draw the line as to the boundaries of a town?

In straightforward situations, where the boundaries of towns and neighbourhoods do not overlap, the answer is simple, in that the last one sees of his buildings should constitute his boundaries.

But, if the town is a sprawling metropolis, whose buildings may extend and overflow into other towns, doubt could arise as to its known boundaries. That is, can overlapping towns, which may form one metropolitan city, be considered thus for the purposes of observing religious obligations or not?

A. The following will shed some light on the different situations in order to reach the legal opinion commensurate to each case:

174. a. Take town (x) for example whose old boundaries are known. As a result of either outward or inward expansion, i.e. of new neighbourhoods springing here and there around it, these new built areas are considered part of the town. Accordingly, the last building on the periphery of the town should be taken as a guide to determine the required distance of travel away from it, which could eventually have a bearing on whether or not the traveller should say their prayer qasr.

Should the travellers choose to divide their ten-day stay in the town on a number of the town’s new suburbs, they must say their prayer in full because they count as parts of the same town.

175. b. Two historically distinct towns may expand each in the direction of the other so much so that their buildings become almost one, such as Kufa and Najaf, and Baghdad and Kadhimain in Iraq. In such a case, each town retains its independence and distinction, i.e. they do not become one town.

So, if a Kufan travels to Kerbala and on the way back he got to Najaf, his travel will not cease; should he perform prayer at Najaf, it must be qasr. If a traveller sets out on a journey from Baghdad, intending to spend five days in Kufa and another five days in Najaf, he shall not be treated as a 'resident', unless he decides to stay in one of them [for the whole period of ten days].

176. c. Suppose one of the two towns, that later formed one metropolis, was small and the other big. Gradually, the smaller of the two got swollen up by its bigger sister. Both of them will lose their independence to form one metropolis, similar to the first case (174/a).

Precepts Concerning Prayers in Travel

As we have already explained, lawful travel - which entails covering the required distance according to certain stipulations - entails a concession to the traveller by making them say their prayers qasr.

The precepts concerning prayers while in a journey are as follows:

177. a. The four-ruku prayers, i.e. dhuhr, asr, and isha are reduced to two ruku’s each.

178. b. The supererogatory prayers usually said at the same time of dhuhr and asr are dropped. Some jurists are of the opinion that isha supererogatory prayer should be cancelled. However, there is no harm in performing it in the hope of attaining Allah’s pleasure. The supererogatory prayers that usually go hand in hand with maghrib and fajr prayers, and Night prayer no doubt remain fixed.
179. There is a number of situations where the travellers, whose obligation is to say their prayers qasr, could be saying them in full:

a. They could knowingly be contravening the shari'a law vis-vis qasr prayer. Such a prayer is null and void (batil); it is, therefore, incumbent on them to repeat it.

b. They may not be aware of the rule regarding qasr prayer. Their prayer should be good enough.

c. They may be aware of the dictate, yet their understanding of it falls short of being a comprehensive one. That is, they may decide to cover half the required distance in the outward journey and the other half in the return in the knowledge that travelling thus does not require qasr prayer. Such a prayer is deemed in order.

d. The travellers may forget they are travelling, and thus say their prayer in full. If they remember, while still on the move, that it was an oversight, they have to repeat their prayer. If they did not remember until the time for prayers was up, they are not required to repeat the prayers by way of qadha'.

e. They are aware of the shari'a ruling concerning qasr prayer, yet they forgot about it at the moment they started their prayer. Since they did not forget about being in a state of travelling, rather forgetting the ruling, they should do as the persons in the previous example had done.

f. The travellers may be under the impression that the distance they are covering in their travel from point (a) to point (b) falls below what is required by law. Thus, they said their prayer in full. If they realized that it was not, they should follow the rulings discussed under the previous two examples, i.e. (d) and (e).

180. d. Should praying in full be required, yet they say it qasr, it shall not be accepted; thus, it is obligatory on them to say it tamam (in full). That is, irrespective of whether they realized the lapse during the prayer or after it has been said.

There is one exception though; it concerns the travellers observing the ten-day stay in the intended destination; if they, through ignorance, said their prayer by way of qasr, their prayer should be in order.

The persons may be required to say their prayer in full such as in a travel in pursuit of sinful act or hunting for pleasure. Yet, they may not be aware that they should do so. Ruling that [their qasr prayer] is in order should not be ruled out, although repeating it is preferable, as a matter of ihtiyat (precaution).

181. e. Should the time for an obligatory daily prayer set in while the persons concerned are till at 'home', yet they did not say it, because they embarked on a lawful journey. If they want to say that prayer in their travel, while there is still time, it is obligatory on them to say it by way of qasr.

182. f. An obligatory daily prayer may become due nevertheless, they decided to return home. They arrived there while there was still time to say it. In this case, they should say it in full.

183. g. Due to forgetfulness, travellers set out to say prayer in full, while the prayer was still in progress, they realized that they had meant to say it qasr. Such a prayer be deemed batil, should they become aware after executing the third ruku'. Should they remember before that, they have to conclude it come the end of the second ruku; such a prayer should be in order. If they remember while they are still in a standing posture for the third ruku', they have to cancel it, go back to a sitting posture to say tashahhud and tasleem. Such a prayer is also in order.

184. It is mustahab for a traveller who is required to say dhuhr, asr, and isha' prayers qasr, to recite after each one of them the following invocation, "Subahanal Lah, wal Hamdu Lillah, wala Illah Illal Lah, wal Lahu Akbar". (May Allah be exalted, May Allah be praised, There is no god, but Allah, and Allah is greater). Such supplication should be a sort of compensation for the third and fourth ruku' of each of the said prayers.

Chapter Two:

Other Prayers

By 'other prayers', we mean those which are not required on a daily basis. Some of these are wajib, yet the majority are mustahab.

1. Prayer for Unusual Natural Phenomena (Ayat)

Ayat is the [Arabic] plural for Ayah which means a sign or a miracle. Allah says, "And among His signs are the night and the sun and the moon." (37/41). This prayer is called thus because of the reason it is held for. It is among obligatory prayers.

The Reasons Why it is Obligatory

185. These are the reasons that the Ayat prayer becomes obligatory:
a. An eclipse of the sun, be it total or partial.
b. An eclipse of the moon, be it total or partial.
c. Earthquakes.
d. Events which may create fear and concern, such as severe darkness [in day light], wild wind, or thunder.

186. Should any of those four events occur, Ayat prayer becomes obligatory on every mukallaf who is in a position to say prayer, except women who are menstruating (haydh) or who are bleeding after childbirth (nifas).

187. When any of the first three events takes place, Ayat prayer becomes obligatory, regardless of whether the fear of the occurrence happened to took hold over the majority of people. However, the obligation to say the prayer is confined to those people directly affected by the event, although they might have not noticed it because they were asleep, for example.

188. In order for the fourth event to warrant Ayat prayer, it has to cause alarm among most people. If not, it does not become obligatory to perform. What we mean by 'alarm or fear' is not necessarily that the person becomes worried about the fate of the world or the country, rather the psychological tension they are in.

189. Should the cause for concern, as a result of the occurrence of the fourth event, arise in the minds of most people of a particular town, Ayat prayer becomes wajib on its people. If the concern is widespread, so much so that it engulfs residents of nearby areas and towns, they should do the same.
190. The obligation to say Ayat prayer should recur according to the cause. So, if there was an eclipse of the sun and a scaring lightening at the same time, two separate Ayat prayers have to be performed. In such a case, it is recommended that the worshipper should bear in mind that they are saying these two prayers for their own respective reasons.

191. Certitude that the event did happen could be achieved either directly by the worshipper themselves or through the testimony of a person of an impeccable character or that who is trustworthy, or by the forecast of meteorologists, should it inspire confidence and peace of mind.

The Format of Ayat Prayer

192. This prayer consists of two ruku's, each of which entails five ruku' and two sujoos. To inaugurate it, one has to recite takbiratul ihram with the niyyah of qurbah. The worshipper should then recite suratul Fatiha, then another surah, following which the first ruku should be performed. Then, after they have risen, al-Fatiha is recited, then another surah and so on until the five ruku's are performed; they should rise again and go for sujood. On performing the two sujoos, they should rise to begin the second ruku, whose five ruku's are performed in the same way as those of the first. After that tashahhud and tasleem are recited.

193. This prayer may be said in a shortened form. After reciting al-Fatiha, the second surah may be divided into five parts, one part being recited before each of the five ruku's; the basmalah is considered an ayah. Should any part be left from the surah the worshipper chose to read, it must be recited fully before the fifth ruku'. On performing ruku', the worshipper should do the two sujoods. After performing the two sujoods, the second ruku' can be performed in exactly the same way.

194. If, for example, after the second ruku' of this short form of prayer, the worshippers completed reciting the surah they started prayer with and did not confine it to one ayah only, they have, after the third ruku', to recite al-Fatiha again, and start another surah after that. That is, regardless of whether the second surah was that he had just finished reciting. They should then recite one ayah or more of this surah and perform the fourth ruku', then rise again to finish reciting it, provided that one complete ayah or more is left of it.

195. To sum up, there are four points worth noting in the shortened form of Ayat prayer; these are: (a) Any recitation short of one complete ayah is not acceptable, (b) At least, one surah must be completed in any of the two ruku's the prayer consist of. (c) On completing the surah before the fourth ruku', the worshipper has to resume reciting al-Fatiha in the ruku' that follows it, and (d) No part of the surah should be left unrecited prior to performing the fifth ruku'.

Like any other obligatory prayer, all the general guidelines have to be observed in Ayat prayer, such as facing the qiblah and covering oneself.
The Time of Ayat Prayer

196. The time for the prayer in the case of an eclipse is from the beginning of the eclipse till the time when it begins to recede. Thus, it is permissible to take to this prayer at the outset of the eclipse. Its time becomes shorter as the eclipse begins to recede. However, its is preferable to start praying from the beginning of the eclipse. That said, it is not permissible for the mukallaf to delay it until such time that there is no room for accommodating but one rukū’. Yet, should anyone do such a thing either for a valid reason or for being intent on not upholding the obligation, he should still have to start praying immediately; in so doing, he would earn the reward as though he has said it in full, as is the case in an obligatory daily prayer.

197. The prayers for other unusual natural phenomena have no time span, especially when the time of the occurrence is so short that it is impossible to perform the prayer within it. Thus, it should be said as soon as the event takes place.

198. The same goes for an earthquake. Should the worshipper delay the prayer for the earthquake or any other dreadful event either for a valid reason or for ignoring the obligation so much so that the time is up, it is obligatory, in order to discharge one's duty, to say it, specifying neither ada’ nor qadha’.

You may ask: Should there still be time to perform the prayer while the eclipse still receding, yet the worshipper did not do so, are they liable to say it qadha’?
A. The answer to this question shall be discussed in the section dealing with qadha'. However, in short, no qadha' is required only in certain cases. You may refer to para. (15) of the section entitled, "Qadha' Prayer.

2. Prayer for the Two Eids

199. Muslims celebrate two great eids (feasts) which are considered among the most important of celebrations. They are: Eidul Fitr (the day after the end of the fasting month of Ramadhan), and Eidul Adhha (the day pilgrims offer their sacrifices at Mina, i.e. 10th Thil Hijjah; also known as the Festival of Sacrifice).

Allah, the Exalted, has ordained that a special prayer be performed marking these two festivals; it is called the prayer of eid. This prayer is obligatory if it is convened by the followers of the just Imam. Conversely, it is mustahab to say it; in this case, it is permissible to say it individually or in congregation. If it is the latter, there are no restrictions as to the number of worshippers performing it; similarly, there is no problem in holding it in as many places as can be, i.e. unlike Juma' prayer.

It is not obligatory on a travelling person, who is entitled to say qasr prayer, to say eid prayers at any circumstance whether or not it is held under a just Imam. However, it is mustahab for the person in question to perform it.

200. How is it performed?

Eid prayer consists of two ruku's, like Subh prayer.
However, in addition to the usual two-\textit{raka}' prayer there are other things that should be done. That said, a super form of this prayer is thus that in the first rak'a after \textit{takbiratul ihram}, al-Fatiha and another \textit{surah} are recited. Then five \textit{takbirs} (Allahu Akbar) are pronounced followed by five \textit{qu-noots}. After the fifth \textit{qunoot} another takbir should be recited, i.e. before bowing down for \textit{ruku}'; once the latter is performed, [i.e. with its requisite sujood], the worshipper should rise for the second \textit{ruku}'; after the recitation of al-Fatiha and a second \textit{surah}, four \textit{takbirs} followed by four \textit{qu-noots} should be performed; a fifth takbir should then follow prior to bowing down for the second \textit{ruku}'; thus by finishing the complementary parts of the second rak'a the prayer comes to an end.

That said, in the last \textit{qunoot} of each rak'a, it should be present in the worshippers mind that they are performing it in the belief that it be a requirement of a shi'a injunction.

201. After the recitation of al-Fatiha and a second \textit{surah}, the worshiper could confine the number of \textit{takbirs}, and \textit{qunoots}, to three in each of the two-\textit{raka}' prayer.

202. It is more superior and meritorious (\textit{mustahab}) for the worshipper to recited in the first rak'a, after al-Fatiha, \textit{surah ash-Shams })(91), and in the second, again after al-Fatiha, \textit{surah} al-Ghashiyah (88).

203. It is also \textit{mustahab} to recite this famous supplication, i.e. in \textit{qunoot}, "Allahuma ahlal kiriya'i wal adhahmah, wa ahalal joodi wal jabaroot, wa ahalal asfi war rahmah, wa ahalal taqwa wal maghfirah, as'aluka fi ha-thal yawmil lathi ja'altahu lil Islam eida, w'ali Moham-madin salal Lahu alaihi w'alihi wasalam, thukhran wa-mazida, an tusaliya ala Mohammain wa'ali Mohammad, ka'afdhala ma sallayta ala abdin min ibaadik, wa salli ala mala'ikatika wa rusulik, waghsfir lil mo'minina wal mo'minat al ahya' minhum wal amawat, Allahuma inni as'aluka khaira ma sa'alaka ibadukas salihoon, wa a'udhu bika min shari mast'aatha bika minhu ibadukal mukhlasoon" .

Should not be able to memorize this du'a, you can recite it out from a book or the like.

204 . By way of mustahab also, the imam should address the congregation by delivering two sermons separated by a short pause, as is the case in the ceremony of Jum'a prayer.

205 . Should the worshipper say eid prayer in congregation, they are not required to recite al-Fatiha and the second surah in both the ruku's; however, they have to deal with the rest of recitations and acts.

206 . There is neither adhan nor iqamah in this prayer; it is mustahab though, that the caller repeats the word
"as-Salah" - prayer - three times.

207 . The time for this prayer is from sunrise till midday; cease once its time is over, there is no qadha' for it.

208 . Among its mustahab acts are ghusl, ahead of it, reciting audibly and raising the hands in tandem with the takbirs.
3. The Remaining Obligatory and Voluntary Prayers

a. Tawaf Prayer

209. [This prayer is obligatory]. It is usually performed after the pilgrims finish their tawaf around the Holy Ka'ba. A detailed account of this prayer has been given in our "Manual of Hajj Rituals". However, an outline of its rules shall be given in the Chapter on Hajj and Umrah of this book.

b. Wahshah Prayer

210. Literally, wahshah means loneliness, desolation, or melancholy. It is also known as "a present for the deceased or their graves". It is called for in a number of credible reports. The time [for this mustahab prayer] is the night after the burial.

It consists of two ruku's, i.e. similar to Subh prayer. In the first, Suratul Fatiha and Ayatul Kursi, from ayah (255) to ayah (257) of Suratul Baqarah are recited and in the second rak'a', al-Fatiha and Suratul Qadir the latter should be repeated ten times. On completion, the worshipper can say, "Allahuma Salli Ala Mohammadin Wa'ali Mohammad - Peace be with Mohammad and his Household - and May Allah benefit the deceased (x) with its reward, i.e. naming the dead person".

In another report it is related that after reciting al-Fatiha in the first rak'a', at-Tawhid/al-Ikhlas (Surah 112) is recited twice, and in the second rak'a' at-Takathur (Surah 102) ten times. Then, say du'a (supplication) for the soul of the dead person.

c. Special Prayer on the First Day of Every Month

211. According to handed down tradition, performing special prayer on the first day of every month is mustahab. It consists of two ruku's. In the first one, after reciting al-Fatiha, at-Tawhid (Surah 112) is recited thirty times; in the second, after al-Fatiha, al-Qadr (Surah 97) is recited thirty times. Then, you may give something away in charity.

After the prayer has been said, it is mustahab to recite the following ayahs: (6/11), (10/107), (6/17), and these ayahs - in part - . . . Allah brings about ease after difficulty, 7/652, (It is as Allah has pleased, there is no power save in Allah, . . , 18/139. (Allah is sufficient for us and most excellent is the Protector, (173/300), and I entrust my affair to Allah, Surely Allah sees the servants, 44/402, (There is no god but Thou, glory be to Thee; surely I am of those who make themselves to suffer loss., 87/212, (My Lord! surely I stand in need of whatever good Thou mayest send down to me, '24/282, (O my Lord! leave me not alone; and Thou art the best of inheritors, .(21/89).

The time for this prayer starts at dawn till the sunset of that day.

d. Prayer of Ghufailah

212. This is one of the mustahab prayers. It has been related in a hadith that it earns [the person] who performs it the domain of honour. Its time is during the first hours of the evening, i.e. between maghrib and isha prayers. It may be considered as a daily prayer.
Ghufailah, prayer consists of two ruku's. As has been related, the way to perform it is such that in the first rak'a', the worshipper should recite, after al-Fatiha, (And when Yunus went away in wrath, so he thought We would not straiten him, so he called out among afflictions: There is no god but Thou, glory be to Thee; surely I am of those who make themselves to suffer loss" (21/87).

In the second rak'a', after al-Fatiha, (With Him are the keys of the Unseen, none knows them but He. He knows what is on the earth and in the sea. Not a leaf falls, but He knows it; not grain in the darkness of the earth, nor anything fresh or withered, but it is in a Book Manifest". (6/59).

The following qunoot is then recited, (Allahumma inni as'aluka be mafatihil ghaibil lati la ya'lamuha illa anta, an tusalliya ala Mohammadin wa 'ali Mohammad), after which you may ask your particular need. You can then say, "Allahuma anta waliyu ni'mati wal qadiri ala talibati ta'lamu hajati, fas'aluka bihaqi Mohammadin wa 'ali Mohammad, alayhi wa alayhimus salam, illa qadhaytah lee). You are then free to invoke Allah's glory and mercy with any form of supplication.

Anyone performing this prayer, shortly after maghrib prayer, may confine it to two ruku's of maghrib supererogatory prayer, i.e. maghrib's sister. As has already been discussed, this prayer consists of two two-rak'a' prayer. That is, you can reserve one of them for Ghufailah prayer.

\[\text{e} \]. The Special Prayer as Used to be Performed by Ja'far

213. This prayer is also known as 'the prayer of Tasbih'.
Clear Guide to Islamic Rulings

It is one of the mustahab prayers. It consists of two prayers of two-raka' each; where it diverges from the usual two-raka' prayer, [i.e. that of Subh], is that you should say, "Subhanallahi wa Hamdu Lillahi, wala Ilaha Illallah, wala Lahu Akbar", fifty seven times; that is, fifteen times in each ruku after reciting al-Fatiha and a second surah, ten times during ruku' (bowing down posture), ten times after rising from ruku', i.e. while standing, ten times while performing the first sujood, ten times after lifting your head from sujood, i.e. while seated, before going for the second sujood, during which another ten times of the phrase should be recited, and ten times after performing the second ruku'.

The same routine should be applied in the second rak'a, leading to tashahhud and tasleem.

The second prayer is a repeat of the procedure followed in the first prayer.

The believers have been enjoined to make a habit of saying this prayer every week or every month, it is said that Allah, the Most High, shall, for the sake of observing this prayer, forgive the worshippers their sins.

It is permissible that anyone performing another supererogatory or a qadha prayer can introduce the special features of Ja'far prayer into them, thus reaping the reward for both the prayers.

f. Prayer for Istikharah (Seeking Allah's Guidance)

214 This prayer is among the mustahab prayers. Through which the worshipper asks their Lord to provide them with guidance and resolve their affair for that which is good. It has been related from Imam as-Sadiq (a. s.) that he said, "When anyone of you feels the need to ask for something to be fulfilled, let them perform a two-rak'a prayer. After that, praise Allah and thank Him, ask Allah to bless Mohammad and his pure progeny and say, 'Allahumma In Kana Hathal Amr Khayran fi Dini wa Dunyay, fa Yasirhu Lee wa Qaddirh; wa In Kana Ghayra Thalik, fas Rifhu Anni, meaning, 'O Lord! should this affair be of any good to me in my life and religion, then resolve it for me. If it is anything else, I pray to you to steer it away from me'"

g. Prayer for a Need to be Satisfied

215. It is mustahab to say a two-rak'a prayer when someone stands in need of something to be considered sympathetically. There are numerous versions of how it should be conducted. However, one of these is that the person concerned with the request should perform wudhu, then give something away in charity, and go to the mosque to say a two-rak'a prayer; after the prayer they should say a special invocation whereby they should recite the praise of Allah and glorify Him, call for peace to be with the Prophet (s. a. w.) and their pure progeny, and then ask Allah for their request to be fulfilled, pledging that they would perform a certain devotion as a way of thanks giving when He answers their prayers, which could be any one of these: Fasting the Month of Rajab, giving alms to the poor, or contributing to a charitable cause.

h. Prayer for Rainfall

216. This prayer is mustahab when there is a dire need for water due to lack of rain. It consists of two ruku’s. It is identical to Eid prayer both in form and procedure, including the sermon after the prayer.

However, in qunoot, it is more appropriate to ask of the Almighty to send the rain down and satisfy the need for water.

Istisqa', lit. Request for irrigation, prayer can be held in congregation only; all those taking part in it, including the imam, should implore Allah before, during and after prayer, to alleviate their situation.
Chapter Three:
General Guidelines of Prayers

Foreword

We have already discussed the types of prayer, be it obligatory or voluntary, daily or otherwise, the format of each type, and the rules governing each type. We have also discussed that all prayers have certain features in common; this we have mentioned in broad terms.

Here we will dwell on all aspects of prayers. For example, we now know that ruku' is a general feature of prayer. But how precisely should it be done so that it can be deemed correct? How low should the worshipper bow down? What sorts of utterances can the worshipper safely embark on while in ruku'? What is the alternative if the worshipper cannot do ruku' due to illness or the like?

These are the areas we are going to deal with here; we will discuss the general requisites first, then the main or general parts of prayer.
As you may know, we have already discussed, in the Chapters dedicated to Taharah, that for prayer to be accepted certain conditions have to be fulfilled, in that the worshipper has to be in a state of taharah both in body and in attire; there has to be wudhu or ghusl in certain cases.

In this Chapter, we will discuss the remaining conditions in some detail:

1. Qiblah

   generally speaking, qiblah means direction. Technically, though, it is the direction where the Holy Ka'ba is situated. Allah, Glorified is He, has ordained that in prayer we should set our faces in that direction.

   As a result of making it a qiblah for all Muslims, the Holy Ka'ba has become a symbol for their unity and one of the main features of the identity of the Muslim Ummah. All Muslims, irrespective of their persuasions, turn to that focal point as an expression of unity in essence and goal.

   The Holy Ka'ba is not a qiblah as a building, rather a site which extends both upward and downward. That is, if you were aboard a plane and wanted to say prayer, it would suffice to face the qiblah. If you were in a lower ground floor or in a basement and wanted to pray, you can still face the Ka'ba.

   Since the earth is a globe, you can seldom have a straight line between the worshipper in prayer and the Holy Ka'ba, in that most of what you get is a curve. The yardstick of setting one's face in the direction of the qiblah is for the worshipper to choose the shortest of the earth's curvatures nearest to where they are and the Holy Ka'ba.

Suppose your place is situated north of the qiblah, i.e. some one quarter of the distance away from the Equator. To determine the direction of Ka'ba, you have to be standing facing South; facing North will not yield the same result. That is because the curvature which sets you apart from Ka'ba in the first instance is equal to one quarter of the earth's diameter, whereas in the second instance, the curvature sets you apart by three quarters the distance. Thus, the first line is shorter and through it the true facing of the qiblah is materialized.

Setting one's face in the direction of qiblah is a prerequisite for the acceptance of the five obligatory daily prayers in all their parts, including the forgotten ones thereof, which are performed after the prayer has been completed (sujood and tashahhud), precautionary ruku', but not sujood-as-sahu (Prostration for error).

Facing the qiblah is also obligatory in all the other types of prayer, be they wajib or mustahab, such as ayat prayer and prayer for the dead.

2. There are some exceptions though, e.g. in a superregulatory prayer said while the person is in motion. The same applies to a passenger in a car, ship, or plane while in motion. If the superregulatory prayer is said while the worshipper is not in any of the previous situations, i.e. stationary, it is not known that their prayer is valid, unless they faced the qiblah, as is customary in any obligatory daily prayer.

How can the worshippers be sure that they are facing the qiblah?

3. It goes without saying that those living close to the Holy Ka'ba, such as the worshippers in the sanctuary of al-Masjidil Haraam (the Grand Mosque) where the Ka'ba takes a centre stage, are in a position to ascertain with a degree of ease the direction of qiblah and as a result set their face towards it. Those who live at a great distance from the Ka'ba may face some difficulty in ascertaining the right position of the qiblah; and as the distance between their place of domicile or work grows bigger the difficulty becomes more acute.

To overcome this difficulty, people, in Iraq for instance, depended for some time on the compass to determine the location of Makkah, where the Ka'ba is. By pinpointing South and North points, the direction of the Ka'ba can be identified. That is, roughly in the South. However, for the near-exact location, the degree of skewness of Makkah away from the South, because it does not geographically lie exactly in that direction, was taken into account. It was further noticed that there was a degree of imprecision between the magnetic South to which the hand in the compass points and the geographic South according to which the degree of skewness of any given country lie away from the South.

In the light of these discoveries a special compass, used by the worshippers for verifying the direction of the Ka'ba, has been introduced.
Acting according to this compass is permissible and therefore acceptable.

4. Should the worshipper who lives far away not be in a position to determine the direction of the Ka'ba, they can rely on any of the following ways:

a. The testimony, or information, of other Muslims of probity.

b. What Muslims used to know as the direction of the qiblah, especially the location of the mihrab (prayer niche), usually pointing to the qiblah, in their mosques.

c. What Muslims used to practice in burying their dead, where the dead body is usually laid to rest on its right side, facing the qiblah; the graves in a cemetery is another indicator to the direction of the qiblah.

However, it is permissible for worshippers to rely on these devices, provided that they do not have any information that the devices are erroneous.

5. d. Personal investigation:

Should none of the previous tools be available to the persons concerned, it is obligatory on them to do their best in endeavouring to find the direction of the qiblah. Acting on the basis of an informed guess by observing the distinguishing marks and the evidence would be in order. In this particular case, if a knowledgeable trustworthy person informs them of the direction of the qiblah, they are free to rely on the information of that person. That is, if their own investigation did not lead them to an informed guess about the direction of the qiblah, or such an informed guess concurred with the person’s information.

A situation may arise in that the informed guess of the worshippers could lead them to a different direction from that of the trustworthy person and that they remained wed to their own conviction. In such a situation, they have, in order to absolve themselves of the responsibility, to say their prayer twice, once in the direction they themselves believe to be the right one and another in the direction they were informed of by the trustworthy person. However, we are more inclined (al adhhar) to recommend that the worshipper should rely on the information provided by the trustworthy person, and thus a prayer said in that direction would suffice.

Should the mukallaf exhaust all avenues only to come to nothing, not even guesswork, one prayer said in any direction they choose would do. That is, if all directions yield the same level of ambiguity; should this not be the case, in that there may be some directions which are less ambiguous, they have to act according to that which is less ambiguous.

Example: The mukallaf may be inclined to think that there may be a more than 50% chance that the qiblah may lie in one of two directions. In such a case, they have to say their prayer facing one of these two directions.

Veering from the Qiblah

6. The prayer is deemed batil, should they realize that they had said it not facing the qiblah. That is, regardless of whether they knew that Allah had ordained that it be said in the direction of the qiblah or they were ignorant of the rule. However, should they be unaware of the rule and their realization was that they were standing either to the left or right of the correct direction, the ruling in considering their prayer batil is based on obligatory precaution.

7. Once they finished their prayer, which they mistakenly thought was performed in the right direction, what should they do?

A. If they found out after the prayer time for that particular prayer was already up, such a prayer should be in order; accordingly, they do not have to incur anything. Should they realize their mistake while there is still time for prayer, they have to repeat it. That is, if the degree of digression from the qiblah was great to the extent that it might have been to their right or their left or their hind. If the degree of deviation was less than that, no repeat prayer should be required.

8. What if the worshippers realized the mistake while the prayer is still in progress?

A. Should the digression be great, as explained in the previous answer, the prayer has to be cut short and a repeat prayer must ensue. Otherwise, the worshippers must correct the angle at the moment they knew of the problem; thus their prayer should be deemed valid, i.e. they do not have to repeat it.
2. What Should be Worn During Prayer

9. It is obligatory on a man embarking on prayer to wear what covers his private parts, irrespective of whether the prayer was performed in private or in public. This is the [minimum] of clothing required in prayer, i.e. a man is not allowed to pray naked.

For a woman, all her body must be covered apart from the face, the hands, and the feet. This covering is obligatory in all prayers, except when performing prayer for the dead; it is also obligatory in precautionary ruku', and the forgotten parts of prayer, but not sujood-as-sahu.

10. [In an emergency], for a man to say prayer, it is sufficient that he wears one garment covering the anterior and the posterior; it also suffices if he wears a wrapper round his waist or a pair of trousers.

11. Women should cover all their body including the hair, except the face and the hands up to the wrists, and the feet up to the ankles, from the front as well as the back. On this basis, a woman may wear a garment capable of covering her body and a scarf to cover her head and neck; indeed, she may wear one gown if it was designed to cover all that which must be covered of her body.

12. Transparent clothes, which can barely cover the colour of the skin, would not do as a substitute for the proper clothing required in prayer.
13. If the worshippers do not have clothes, it is obligatory on them to cover themselves with anything that could provide a cover, such as tree leaves or mud. There and then they can say their prayer.

14. Should tree leaves or the like not be available, they have to choose a secluded place to say their prayer to avoid being looked at. If this was not feasible, they should say their prayer seated and nodding for both ruku' and sujood, doing their best not to expose [more of their body].

If the mukallafs happened to be in a place where no onlookers are present, they should perform their prayer in the usual manner. However, they may, out of choice, repeat the prayer from a sitting position, following the same procedure just mentioned.

15. Should any part of the worshippers body, which should be covered in prayer, be exposed and they came to know about it while prayer was still in progress, yet they did not take remedial action to cover it, their prayer shall be deemed null and void. However, where the worshipper is not aware of the exposure, until they completed their prayer, it should be valid; and they do not have to repeat it. The same applies to him who is ignorant of the fact that covering one's body and private parts is obligatory in prayer. That is, even if any of his body parts get uncovered without him paying attention to that.

16. Should the worshippers realize, while the prayer is still in progress, that a part of their body got uncovered, their prayer still counts, in that they do not have to repeat it. The same applies to the worshippers who, through ignorance of the rules, say prayer without due care to covering himself.

Conditions Concerning Clothing

Worshippers embarking on prayer may be wearing one garment, or a number of items, to cover their body. However, no matter what type of clothes you should be wearing, they must fulfill a number of conditions:

a. Taharah, the details of which have already been discussed in the Chapter concerning Najasah, paras. (48 and 71).

17. b. Any clothing should not be made of the skin or hair of an animal whose meat is not halal to eat, such as that of any beast; that is, even such animals were killed according to the Islamic code of slaughtering. Prayer said by the worshipper wearing such clothes is not valid. Nevertheless, any part of such animal coming into contact with the clothes or body of the worshipper will render the prayer batil. [For example], should the worshipper pray with a cat’s hair on their clothes, their prayer is batil.

18. However, this ban does not cover all parts of some other living beings, which have no body mass, although eating them is not permissible. Things like mosquitoes, flees, ants, honey and wax [produced by bees], and what is produced by silkworms; pearl shells are also outside the remit of this ban.

19. Things that are linked to the human body, such as hair, milk etc., are also not covered by such a ban, in that prayer is deemed in order even with the presence of any part of these on the body or clothes of the worshipper.

20. The exemption of certain categories of animals among those whose meat is not allowed for eating concerns those whose blood does not spurt out when a blood their vessels are severed, be they land or marine animals. Wearing clothes or other clothing items made with [leather or fur] of such animals in prayer is allowed.

21. Doubt may arise as to the origin of an (x) item of clothing, i.e. whether it be traced to an animal whose meat is haraam or to that whose meat is halal. Such a doubt has no bearing on the validity or otherwise of prayer performed with that item being worn.

22. c. Insofar as men are concerned, they are not allowed to wear any garment made of natural silk, i.e. that which is produced by silkworm; however, synthetic silk and all other delicate soft fabrics are allowed.

23. Prayer would not be good enough, if it was performed by a person wearing pure natural silk; should the garment worn during prayer be made of blended material, it should be in order, barring that the quantity of the non-silk material was so minute that you can hardly trace it.

24. Is it permissible to wear a garment whose lining is made of pure silk? And is wearing such a garment in prayer sanctioned, if silk was used in its embroidery or its other accessories?
A. No, for the lining. The rest can be tolerated.

25. Doubt may arise as to the material an (x) garment is made of, i.e. whether it is made of silk or cotton, pure silk or synthetic, pure silk or a blend, etc. [Such doubt can be ruled out], in that it is permissible to wear it in prayer.

26. The ban on [men] wearing silk is not confined to prayer. It is banned throughout as will be discussed.

27. Women, however, are allowed to wear silk clothes, be it in prayer or outside it.

28. d. Men are not allowed to wear anything made of gold, be it gold ring, watch strap, or pocket watch chain. Prayer is not deemed good enough, if it was said with the man wearing a ring. As for the watch chain, the worshipper is urged, as a matter of ihtiyat and wajib, not to wear it during prayer.

29. However, men are allowed to carry gold watches in their pockets, use gold crowns on their teeth, gold buttons, and military gold emblems and medals. This does not amount to wearing gold. The criterion for wearing gold is that when the gold item is worn, it should form a ring around any part or limb of the man’s body. This is true of the ring, the bracelet or strap; but it is not true of the carried watch or the button.

30. Just as it is not permissible to wear a pure gold ring, so is it not permissible to wear it, if it contained metals other than gold; that said, the percentage of any blend of metal should be minimal, in that such a ring would still be recognized as gold according to established practice (urf). Should the percentage of other metals be such that it can no longer be called gold, it is permissible to wear it during prayer. If the ring was made of gold, but was plated with silver or any other metal, wearing it during prayer is not permissible.

31. Prayer is permissible with the worshipper wearing a platinum ring. So is it permissible to wear during prayer a ring made of gold that is blended with a white metal such as platinum or silver; yet, the ring in question can no longer be called gold because it has lost its golden color, in that it has become conspicuously white, so much so that it could be said it is not gold. But, if it still can be called gold, the change of color to a non-golden one would not affect the ruling [of prohibition].

32. All gold items of jewellery that are forbidden during prayer are equally not permissible to wear outside prayer because wearing them is absolutely haraam for men.

33. Women are free to wear gold jewellery, be it during prayer or otherwise.

34. It is not permissible for any mukallafs to usurp an item of clothing to wear during prayer. Should they wear it, they would be guilty, regardless of whether they said their prayer wearing it or not. If they went ahead and performed prayer in that usurped garment, such a prayer is deemed null and void; that is, if they were aware of the fact that their action, [i.e. usurpation] is haraam, and that the garment was big enough to cover the private parts, as a matter of obligatory precaution;
if it is not the case, i. e. without it being big enough to cover the private parts, prayer would not be deemed ba-til.

Should we assume that the perpetrator was ignorant, their prayer should be valid, although ihtiyat must be followed where the ignorant person was both aware of the rule and negligent.

35. The worshippers may take to prayer wearing that which is not allowed, be it taken from an animal whose meat is not halal to eat, silk garment, gold ring, yet they are not aware or are ignorant that they are not allowed to do so. In such a case, their prayer is valid; they are not required to repeat it after they have completed it, should they come to know about the rule. Should they become aware of the rule during prayer, their prayer can still be judged valid, if they hastened to take off the forbidden item they were wearing.

36. In the event of the non-availability of an item of clothes, apart from one that is najis, prayer in such a garment would be deemed valid, provided that the worshipper was not in a position to render the garment ta-hir.

37. During prayer the worshippers may [become aware] that the garment they are wearing is made of material taken from an animal whose meat is not permissible to eat. They have to take it off, and, where possible, cover themselves with anything available, such as tree leaves.
38. In case one garment, made of pure silk, was available, the worshippers should not contemplate wearing it. The alternative is that they should say their prayer naked, sparing no effort to cover their private parts by way of tree leaves or such like. Should the worshipper not be in a position to take off that garment for any good reason, such as illness, they are allowed to say their prayer in the said garment, provided that it was not feasible, during prayer time, to take it off.

39. The worshipper may have the choice to wear one of two garments, one is haraam to wear at all time, including in prayer, such as that made of pure silk; the other is permissible to wear at all time. However, it was not feasible to distinguish the lawful from the unlawful. Should there be no third garment, the worshipper should say their prayer without either, endeavouring in the process to cover their private parts with tree leaves or the like.

40. Suppose both garments were lawful to wear outside prayer. However, one of them you cannot wear in prayer, such as that made of fur of the beast, and the other you can, such as that made of cotton. Should you be in a position whereby you cannot tell which is which, you have to say prayer twice, once in each of the two garments.

41. It is permissible for the worshippers who are unable to acquire the garment that is lawful to say prayer with, to hasten to say their prayer on its prime time, either naked or using any emergency covering as has already been discussed. That is, even if there was a possibility that the situation might not prevail until the end of prayer time.

However, the said worshippers might have said prayer during the early part of prayer time without the garment that is sanctioned by shari’a. After a short while, while there was still time for prayer, they came by a garment which can be worn during prayer. In such a case, the worshipper is not required to repeat their prayer, except in the case where the worshippers state is that they cannot say their prayer only by way of nodding to suggest that what they are doing is either ruku’ or sujood.

3. The Place of Prayer

42. The worshippers must choose a place where they can perform their prayer with all its requirements while in a stable position. That is, praying in a place which is in constant motion, e.g. on a plane, car, boat, train, or mounted should be avoided, especially if it entails instability of the worshipper in prayers to the extent that it becomes difficult to maintain one’s position in relation to the direction of qiblah. But supposing that they could, there is no objection to praying in such places.

43. The worshippers may board a train or a plane before prayer time. However, when the time sets in, they could not perform prayer fully in a stable condition; in this case, they either postpone the prayer until they disembark, time permitting, or, if this was not feasible, perform it, doing their best to keep steady and keep staying put in the direction of qiblah, at least when uttering takbiratul ihram.

44. Suppose a travelling person knew that they would reach their destination just before, say, sunrise, leaving just enough time for performing one ruku' of subh prayer within the time allowed. Is it preferable to say one's prayer on board the means of transport or to wait until one gets off?

A. If the prayer that particular means of transport lacked both steadiness and facing the qiblah or just the latter, it is obligatory to wait [until one arrives to one's destination]. If it lacked steadiness, it becomes obligatory to say one's prayer on board the means of transport they happen to be using.

45. It may be possible for a person travelling in a car to stop en-route to say their prayer. Yet, they are not allowed to perform their prayer, if they were not sure of maintaining a position in the direction of the qiblah, nor were they sure of achieving stability while in a standing position in that prayer.

The time for a given prayer may enter while the traveller's plane or train is not yet due. Furthermore, the journey may take all the time of prayer and more. In such a case, the mu-kallaf must hasten to say prayer before embarking on their journey. That is, if it is not possible to say it on board.

46. All what we have been discussing thus far applies to the obligatory daily prayers. Any superregatory prayer can be performed aboard the means of transport the traveller happens to be using. That is, the traveller is not required to observe facing the qiblah, nor are they re-required to maintain a steady posture while praying.

47. Praying in the immediate vicinity of the tomb of the infallible, can one occupy a place which could be seen that they are turning their back to the grave?

A. Apparently, it is permissible, unless it constitutes an act of sacrilege as espoused by the generality of men and women (al urfil aam), which varies from place to place and community to community.

48. A worshipper might perform his prayer in a place with the permission of the owner. Such a prayer is no doubt valid. However, in certain circumstances it might be deemed batil. This is going to be discussed later on under the Rules of Sujood.

49. There is no harm in a man praying in a place with a woman praying nearby. It does not matter whether the woman was related to him or not, neither does it matter whether she was close to him or at some distance, to his right or left, in front or behind him.

50. It is permissible for a person to say their prayer inside the Holy Ka'ba.

4. The Niiyah

The three elements which constitute the niiyah:

51. Niiyah is a prerequisite for each and every prayer. That is, it has to fulfill the following:

a. There has to be niiyah of qurbah because prayer is an act of worship and thus it would not be good enough without such a niyyah, as has already been discussed in the Chapter dealing with Acts of Worship.

b. Genuine intention. That is, it should not be tinged with any hypocrisy as it is haraam and thus nullifies prayer. This too has already been discussed in the Chapter on Acts of Worship.

c. Naming the particular prayer one intends to perform, such as subh, dhuhr, asr, maghrib, isha' and their twin supererogatory prayers, Juma' ayat, late night, eid, istisqa' prayers, etc. If the worshippers want to pray a two-rak'a voluntary prayer, they must observe the niyyah of qurbah in a general sense.

The number of ruku's of any prayer is immaterial, be it similar to another one, like dhuhr, asr, and isha' or a unique one, like Maghrib, i.e. being a three-rak'a prayer. That is, you have to call the prayer you are embarking on by its own name.

Thus, the intention [to perform any particular prayer] becomes an obligation in its own right, regardless of whether or not there be room for getting it wrong. However, we maintain that the intention had to be linked to the name of the prayer in hand, i.e. there might arise confusion (ishtibah) without it.

Accordingly, this condition has been considered as one of the prerequisites of niyyah -which should not be the case. That is, intending to perform prayer while in one's all senses, cannot be separated from naming the particular prayer in hand.

52. The first two conditions have to be observed in all parts of prayer, right from takbiratul ihram to the end. However, this does not mean that niyyah should be made ahead of prayer, nay it should not be delayed beyond the first of its parts, i.e. takbiratul ihram.

Furthermore, in saying that "niyyah has to be present throughout prayer" should not mean that the worshippers must be fully aware of the niyyah at all time as though they were in the moment of its inception. That is, if the worshippers made niyyah, followed it by takbiratul ihram, and carried on with their prayer, then forgot about the niyyah, their prayer would be valid so long as the niyyah is still deep-seated in their mind so much so that if they were asked what they were doing, they would readily reply: We are praying to seek nearness to Allah.

53. As for the intention to say the particular prayer, as called for by the shari'a, it must be present throughout. That is, if, while the prayer is still in progress, the worshipper had in mind some other prayer and finished it as such, their originally intended prayer would be batil, except in two cases:

54. a. The apparent switch (from one niyyah to another) must have been triggered by forgetfulness or absent-mindedness. For example, if you embarked on subh prayer, thinking while prayer was still in progress that you were praying a supererogatory one, and completing it as such, a prayer thus performed is valid and will count as subh. The opposite is true as well. In short, what counts at the end of the day is the original motivation or intention, and that transient absent-mindedness does not have any bearing on the end result.

55. b. The switching of niyyah from one prayer to the other is confined to the cases where it is permissible.

For example, suppose you were praying asr only to remember that you did not say dhuhur. In such a case, you can switch niyyah from asr to dhuhur and complete your prayer as dhuhur.

Another example could be that of a person praying isha’, who, before the last ruku’, remembered that they did not perform maghrib prayer; the switch to maghrib here is also justified.

A third example could be of a person who, while in prayer, remembered that they should be performing another qadha’ prayer whose time has preceded the one in hand and that both tally in the number of ruku’s. They are permitted to make the switch.

56. The worshipper may switch niyyah to another prayer where such a switch is not permissible, such as from dhuhur to asr. Yet, having done that, they reverted to the niyyah of dhuhur. Is it permissible for them to do that?

A. It depends on what stage of prayer they were in. However, if they have just started, there is no problem in that. If they have executed any major part of prayer, which cannot be rectified, such as ruku’, the prayer is deemed batil, in that it should not count, even if it was completed. If the part which has been executed is of the type which can be re-taken, such as tashahhud, it could be repeated with the newly adopted niyyah. That is, if the switch was from asr to dhuhur, the prayer is valid as dhuhur, provided that tashahhud is repeated to suit the new niyyah.

More details of what can or cannot be repeated will be discussed later on.

57. Once the worshippers resolved which prayer they were going to say, it is not necessary that they state the name of the day it was intended for. So, if it was dhuhur, they do not need to allocate it for today or a previous day they.

58. The worshippers may inadvertently make niyyah for an obligatory daily prayer for a day that has passed, only to realize after they had finished that it was for the current day not the one that had already passed. Such a prayer is valid, in that they do not have to repeat it. This applies too, if the situation was the reverse.

Questions on the Three Prerequisites

59. a. Some prayers are obligatory whereas others are voluntary. Should the worshipper always be alert,
i. e. insofar as niyyah is concerned, as to the nature of particular prayer they are performing?

A. It is not a must so long as the worshipper is obedient to Allah's injunctions.

60. b. Hypocrisy off could impinge on the major parts of one's prayer, thus rendering it batil. It could be confined to the general format of prayer and the voluntary acts that may go into it. Does such hypocrisy detract from the validity of prayer?

A. Voluntary acts connected to prayer may vary and be distinguished from its integral obligatory parts. Qunoot is one of these voluntary acts; in other instances, it could be a general state that characterises the way prayer is performed, such as performing it in the mosque or on its prime time.

As for the first case [i.e. qunoot], showing off should not invalidate prayer; nevertheless, the worshipper will be deemed guilty for resorting to hypocrisy. There are two interpretations for the second case:

1. The mukallaf could be intent on deception at the outset, i.e. whether or not they prayed. For example, they may aim, from being in the mosque, to give the impression to others that they are among those who frequent the mosque; if it so happened that they said prayer for the sake of Allah, such prayer would be in order.

2. The mukallaf could be intent on pulling the wool over the eyes of the others. For example, the intent of the mukallaf for being in the mosque could merely be to show that they are keen on choosing what is best for the sake of saying their prayer. A prayer thus performed is batil.

61. c. Worshippers may embark on prayer. At some stage in their prayer, they decide to cut it short, or do that which invalidates it. What is the ruling in such a case?

A. Should they choose to revert to their original niyyah before executing any part of it or doing that which contravenes and renders it batil, their prayer is valid, if they complete it as it ought to be performed.

Should they finish the prayer while still in a state of a limbo insofar as the niyyah of either breaking the prayer or doing that which invalidates it, or remained undecided between breaking and finishing it, their prayer is deemed batil, even if they did not do anything that may detract from it in any way.

If the mukallaafs executed any part thereof after they had decided on the niyyah of cutting the prayer short, only to revert to their original niyyah, there may be a number of issues to consider:

In the event of having executed ruku or sujood, the prayer should be deemed batil. If it was other parts or acts of prayer, such as tashahhud, the recitation of suratul-Fatiha or dhikr, the prayer is deemed batil, had they made the niyyah that (tashahhud) was part of the prayer they intended to break. Had this not been their intention, in that they recited tashahhud as a unit independent of prayer, they may, if they had changed their minds regarding the niyyah of breaking the prayer, repeat same at the time of change and carry on with their prayer. They do not need to do anything else.

The Case for Doubt

62. The worshippers may embark on their prayer with a lingering doubt that they might not be in a position to finish it. For example, you could be saying your prayer in a place renowned for its overcrowding, such as al Masjidil Haraam during the pilgrimage season.

Right from the start, you were hoping that you would be able to finish your prayer without being forced to duck and weave. Should this materialize, i.e. saying your entire prayer while still maintaining a steady position, your prayer shall be in order and therefore accepted.
63. Creeps say their prayer in public but doubt crept into their mind as to whether or not they had intended the prayer. Those - who for, the sake of being seen by others, such prayer does not count.

64. Those who say their prayer in public, knowing fully well that they are doing so for the sake of Allah, however, they start having second thoughts that they might be showing off. That is, they made people party to Allah in their motives. This should not detract from the validity of prayer.

65. Someone embarked on an obligatory daily prayer. At some stage in the prayer, they could not determine whether it was dhuhur or asr prayer they were performing. What should they do?

A. If they have not said dhuhur before that, they should assume that the prayer in hand is that of dhuhur and finish it as such. They could then say asr. If they have already said asr, the prayer in hand is batil. They have to start afresh with the niyyah of asr. The same goes for the other prayers, maghrib and isha, unless they have already done the fourth ruku.

66. Suppose someone prepared for dhuhur prayer on a given day. Once they embarked on it, having completed quite a portion of it, they started having second thoughts as to whether it was really the same prayer they set out to perform or it could be that they have made niyyah for a missed prayer which they did not intend to say. Such a prayer is batil. Accordingly, the person must start afresh with a definite niyyah for a definite prayer.

67. A person may embark on a particular prayer for the day, only to find themselves not able to decide whether the prayer in hand was really for that day or for a previous day. They may even have doubts as to the nature of prayer, i.e. whether it was an obligatory daily prayer or a supererogatory one. Such a prayer is not good enough. Thus, the worshipper must start anew determining a proper niyyah.
Chapter Four:

1. Takbiratul Ihram

68. Takbiratul Ihram, or the statement of "Allahu Akbar" is the inaugural part of prayer. A prophetic hadith concludes, "The moment takbiratul ihram is uttered, prayer enters a state of consecration, and the moment that state comes to an end is when the worshipper finishes reciting tasleem, meaning that when the worshipper recite takbir, the prayer starts, and thus they should refrain from all that which may render prayer batil until all is done with the recitation of tasleem where and when the worshipper is considered having discharged their obligation.

For that reason takbiratul ihram, and not niyyah, has been treated as the first part of prayer. That is because niyyah alone does not set prayer rolling.

69. The Wording

"Allahu Akbar", as we have already mentioned is the precise wording of takbiratul ihram. That is, no other wording, such as "al-Khaliqu Akbar", or Allahul Adheem Akbar, is not admissible. Similarly, any equivalent in any other language is not permissible. Whomever is ignorant of this takbir has to learn it. Should there be not enough time, the worshipper has to be trained into learning how to utter it. If this also fails, they should recite it to best of their ability. If it is not feasible for non-Arabic speaking people to say it in its Arabic form, they should do their utmost to say it as close as possible to Arabic. Alternatively, they may utter what is equivalent to the Arabic phrase.

70. Insofar as its meaning is concerned, takbiratul ihram has to be recited independent of any other utterance, i.e. neither prior to it nor after it. Thus, it is not permissible for the worshipper to say it as part of, say, "Qaalal Mala'ikutu wa Ulul Ilm Allahu Akbar", or, "Allahu Akbar Min Kulli Shay".

71. As an utterance, takbiratul ihram has to be initiated independently. That is, if the worshipper were talking prior to uttering the phrase, "Allahu Akbar", they have to stop at the last letter in such a way that it forms a complete halt of the last sound to avoid encroaching on the sound of hamzah of the word "Allah".

72. Those who could not utter takbiratul ihram could intend to do so in his heart and carple that with sign language where possible, as a matter of al ahwatil awla (a kind of optional precaution).

73. Conditions: Takbiratul ihram must be recited from a standing position. Indeed, the worshipper has to be standing prior to uttering takbir to ensure that it be recited in that position. Just as it is obligatory to recite it standing, so is it obligatory to maintain a certain posture of the standing position. That is, the worshipper must be calm, collected, stable, and upright. This will be elaborated in para. (115), Allah willing.

74. Number of Times: It is obligatory to utter takbiratul ihram once. However, it is recommended (mustahab) to recite "Allahu Akbar" six, four, or two times before the actual one which heralds the start of prayer. In all circumstances, it is preferable to make niyyah that the last of these takbirs is the obligatory one through which prayer is entered into.

75. During takbiratul ihram, it is mustahab for the worshipper to raise their hands close to their ears or face with the palms pointing towards the qiblah and the fingers tucked together.

76. Irregularities: Whomsoever skips takbiratul ihram, their prayer would not count. That is, irrespective of whether it was done deliberately and knowingly that it is obligatory, or inadvertently, including if they were ignorant of it being compulsory. He who abandons the standing position while reciting takbiratul ihram, preferring to do it from a sitting position should receive the same treatment.
The prayer of a person, uttered from a standing position that is neither a stable nor an upright one, can be sanctioned, provided they were ignorant of the fact that movement in the standing position cannot be tolerated. Conversely, the prayer be deemed batil.

Whomsoever recites a second takbir, it is considered as an extra one which might invalidate prayer, if it was done intentionally; should this be the case, they have to recite takbir anew to ensure that the prayer is valid. If the action has emanated from ignorance of what is obligatory or it has been done inadvertently, the prayer should stand.

77. Doubt: If the doubt, as to the utterance of takbiratul ihram has been done or not, arises prior to the obligatory recitation of suratul-Fatiha, the worshipper must utter it. If the doubt arises after the recitation of al-Fatiha has actually begun, they must continue with what they are doing.

However, should the worshippers be aware that they recited the takbir, yet they doubted whether it was sound, they must rule out such a doubt. That is, regardless where the doubt took place, i.e. after or before embarking on al-Fatiha.

2. Recitation During the First and the Second Ruku’

By recitation, we mean the recitation from the Holy Qur'an in prayer. Hadith has it, "No prayer [will count], unless the Fatiha [inaugural surah of the Qur'an] is recited in it".
78. The obligatory part of recitation:

What is obligatory on the worshipper, after uttering takbiratul ihram, is to recite al-Fatiha and part of any other surah, albeit a whole one, after al-Fatiha is preferable as a matter of ih tiyat mustahab. All this goes for first as well as the second ruku.

The recitation of the surah would not be complete unless it is done with Basmalah, i.e. Bismillahir Rahmanir Rahim, wherever it is mentioned at the start of the surah in the Holy Qur'an. Basmalah is an integral part of all surahs in the Qur'an except at-Tawbah.

79. There can be no prayer without surah-al-Fatiha. As for the surahs which are recited after it, they are obligatory, except in the following cases:

a. It is not obligatory to recite other surahs [besides al-Fatiha] in the daily supererogatory prayers and other voluntary ones, although it is preferable to recite those surahs, even if illey turned, by way of nadhr or the like, to be an obligatory one.

b. The recitation of other surahs can be forgone in the event the worshippers find it difficult to do so because of, say, sickness, or being in a hurry to attend a business of his.

c. When time does not allow for reciting both al-Fatiha and another surah, abandoning the recitation of the second surah becomes paramount for the sake of ensuring that the entire prayer in hand, or at least a greater part thereof, would be said within the given time.

There is though a fourth case which will be discussed in the rules governing congregational prayer, Inshallah.

Conditions Concerning the Recitation of the Second Surah

Although the Law-giver has left it to the worshippers to choose which surah, after al-Fatiha, they like to recite, the following conditions have to be observed.

80. a. The worshippers are free to recite a long or a short surah from the Holy Qur'an, provided that there is ample time to recite the longer surahs. Should they, despite the short time left, deliberately choose to recite a long surah, their prayer would be rendered batil. If this is done inadvertently, only to realize their mistake, they must switch to reciting a shorter surah, time permitting. Should they remain unaware of their mistake until they finished prayer, their prayer would be deemed batil. That is, if they were not able to do at least one ruku' inside the appointed time of that prayer. In such a case, they have to repeat it by way of qadha' as a matter of ihitiyat. Otherwise, the prayer is valid.

81. b. It is not permissible for the worshipper to recite any of the four surahs of Azaa'im, already mentioned in para (45) of the Chapter on Ghusl. The reason why it is forbidden to recite them is because they contain ayahs which, when recited, makes it incumbent on the worshipper to prostrate themselves; thus, they could be putting themselves in an untenable situation.

However, should this happen, they should perform the prostration as required by the ayah and repeat their prayer as a matter of ihitiyat. Should the worshipper not prostrate themselves, they would be considered guilty, yet their prayer would still be valid. That said, pointing to the place of sujood while reciting the ayah, i.e. notionally, cannot be ruled out, provided that prostration is performed after the prayer has finished as a matter of ihitiyat.

If the worshippers find themselves in that untenable situation, having inadvertently recited one of these ayahs, what should they do?

A. If they realize their mistake before reciting the ayah which requires them to prostrate themselves, they can switch to another surah; their prayer should be good enough. It should be alright also, even if they remembered after reciting the surah and performing the prostration because such an inadvertent addition in the prayer would not invalidate it.

What would the worshippers do if they heard the ayah which calls for prostration recited while they are in prayer?

A. If they heard it just by chance, i.e. without being attentive, they must carry on with their prayer, in which case it shall be deemed valid; they do not need to worry about anything else. Should they listen to it attentively, they can nod in the direction of the place of sujood, finish their prayer, which will be considered a valid one.

All what we have been discussing thus far, concerning the surahs of Azza'im, is confined to the obligatory daily prayers. As for reciting them in any voluntary prayer, it is permissible and there is no problem in carrying out the required sujood and carrying on with one's prayer as normal.

82. It is not obligatory to decide on the name of the surah right at the start of basmalah. That is, you can recite the basmalah then recite any surah other than, say, the one you have intended, for this reason or the other, in that you do not need to repeat the basmalah.

83. Just as the worshippers are free to choose the surah they like to recite besides al-Fatiha, so are they free to switch to any other one, except in the following cases:

a. Should they be half way through the surah they are reciting, they are not allowed to make the switch.

b. Should they choose to recite al-Ikhlas or al-Kafiroun right at the outset, they are not permitted to switch to another surah, as a matter of obligatory precaution, even if they did not yet as far as the half way mark.

c. The worshippers, in Juma' prayer or dhuhr prayer on the day of Juma', may choose to recite surah al-Juma' in the first ruku' and surah al-Munafiqoun in the second. Should they proceed with the recitation, it is not permissible for them to switch to other surahs.

84. The instances where switching to another surah is prohibited do not cover the following:

a. The situation where the worshippers are forced to do the switch, such as having started reciting, they forgot part thereof or there was not enough time to finish it. That is, irrespective of what surah it was or how long it was.

b. A worshipper performing a supererogatory prayer is free to do the switch as they please.

c. A worshipper performing Juma prayer or dhuhr that day inadvertently started reciting surahs other than the intended ones, i.e. al-Juma' in the first ruku' and al-Munafiqoun in the second. Such are free to make the switch to the intended surahs.

Suppose a worshipper intended to recite surah al-Qadr when he started the basmalah; however, he recited al-Ikhlas instead without actually intending to do so. There is no harm in his reverting his first niyyah by reciting al-Qadr. He would not be treated as though they have made the switch from al-Ikhlas.

Conditions for Recitation

85. a. The recitation of the second surah has to follow the recitation of al-Fatiha, i.e. it is not permissible to recite it before al-Fatiha.

86. b. The recitation has to be correct. This could be achieved through the following:

87. a/1. In identifying the Qur'anic text, one can rely on what is contained in the Holy Book, i.e. the print form, or on a recognized way of recitation dating back to the early days of Islam and the Imams (a.s.). This may include the seven official recitations. Accordingly, the worshipper is free to recite any variation of such as that found in surah al-Fatiha for the phrases, "Maaliki yawmaddin" and "Meliki yawmaddin", "Siratal iathena" either with a 'Seen' or with a 'Sad', or that found in surah al-Ikhlas concerning the word, "Kufuwan", "Kufwan", "Kufu'an", and "Kuf'an". These variations are all acceptable because they have already been covered by the seven officially recognized recitations.

If the recitation is an odd one, i.e. not commonly known at the first era of Islam, it is not permissible to rely on in identifying the correct recitation of the ayahs of the Holy Qur'an. For example, some had recited, "Malaka yawmaddin" by making 'malaka' as a past tense verb; this is very odd and therefore should not be recited on in prayer.

There is no harm if the worshippers recited in the Holy Qur'an or was made to repeat the ayahs after they have been recited by someone who is proficient in the recitation. This is particularly true when the worshippers have just embraced Islam [and may not have any knowledge of Arabic].

If this is not feasible, yet the worshipper can recite al-Fatiha and a part of a second surah, this would be sufficient, even with their ability to learn the surah in its entirety. Should the case be that the worshippers only know how to recite part of al-Fatiha, reciting this part would do. However, they should, as a matter of voluntary ihtiyat, make up the shortfall by whatever they know of other ayahs. In this case what counts is not the number of missing ayahs of al-Fatiha, rather the quantity. That is, the compensatory ayah should not be shorter than the unrecited ayah of al-Fatiha.

In case the worshippers are not in a position to recite anything, be it al-Fatiha or other ayahs, they have to resort to takbir, tasbih, and exaltation (the utterance of La illaha illallah). As a matter of ihtiyat, the latter should be on a par with al-Fatiha, i.e. quantity wise.

88. a/2. The worshipper should observe the harakat (symbols appearing above or below the Arabic characters that denote and aid the proper pronunciation of the words), the words. However, when stopping at the last letter of a word, there is a choice of either pronouncing that harakah or not, i.e. by resorting to sukoon. This is also true when one decides to recite it as a run-on ayah.

89. a/3. The worshippers must [do their best] to achieve the proper pronunciation of each and every letter in the word as the Arabic speaking people do.

90. a/4. One has to be mindful of the proper pronunciation of the 'hamzah which is found, for example, above the 'alif of the word 'Allah', or 'Iyyaka. That is, if you start with it, you have to pronounce it: if it was part of a sentence and preceded by a word ending with a letter with harakah, like dhammah or kasrah, you have to drop the 'hamzah', if it was 'hamzat wasl' and keep it if it was 'hamzat qat'.

For example, if you were to read, "Bismillahir Rahmanir Rahim" in one go, you have to drop the 'hamzah' that appears above all the 'alifs' of the words Allah, Arrahman, and Arrahim, as the 'hamzah' here is that of 'wasl'.

As for the 'hamzat qat' , if you were to read, "Maaliki yawm-middin, Iyyaka na'budu, wa Iyyaka nasta'een", you have to keep the 'hamzah' above the first letter of the word Iyyaka.

91. a/5. 'al' [which is equivalent to the definite article 'the' in English] may be added to certain words, such as 'al-hamd', 'ar-rahman', 'ar-rahim'. At some instances you have to pronounce the 'l' of 'al' fully, at others you have to drop it, the latter is called idgham (amalgamation, or assimilation).

Idgham takes place with thirteen letters of the Arabic alphabet, such as ta’ , tha’, and dal. So, you should not pronounce the 'lam' in the words, al-rahman, al-rahim, al-sirat, and al-dhalleen; [instead the 'l' sound replaced by the sound of the next letter thus: ar-rahman, ar-rahim, as-sirat, and adh-dhalleen]. This is in contrast to pronouncing the 'l' sound in such words as al-hamd, al-'alamin, and al-mustaqeem.

92. For a variety of reasons, there may be worshippers who are not proficient enough in Arabic; some may stammer, others may be non-Arabs, etc. They must do their best to learn Arabic. Should this not yield results, they are excused. Accordingly, the prayer they recite in any way possible shall be valid. They may also resort to praying behind another worshipper [who is proficient in Arabic] to make do with their recitation: this though is not obligatory.

93. Saying prayer to one's best ability is applicable to the ignorant, who is willing to learn, although it is not obligatory on him to say his prayer behind an imam. The ignorant we are talking about is the one who cannot do both, i. e. learning and prayer, at that point in time. That is, he could take to being coached in reciting at some other time.

95. As for the ignorant, who is capable of learning before the time of prayer and is aware of his responsibility to seek learning, yet he did not bother, he has to seek to say his prayer behind another person where possible. Failing to so and ending in saying his prayer solo, his prayer would be deemed batil. If he kept procrastinating till it was late, and did not succeed in his bid to find an imam, it is obligatory on him to perform his prayer to the best of his ability; although such a prayer shall count, he would be considered guilty for being apathetic.

95. A worshipper in prayer became doubtful as to the correct pronunciation of a word. They have to seek guidance in this regard, even if it led them to cut short their prayer, i.e. time permitting. If this was not feasible, even on grounds of time, they have to resort to ihtiyat in pronouncing the word in both the possibilities; in so doing, they do not need to repeat their prayer. This is so because the [doubtful pronunciation] is not part of the ordinary man’s talk.

96. c. The worshipper has to pronounce each and every word in the usual manner, i.e. as is commonly recognized. That is, breaking the word into syllables is not acceptable. Should anything of this sort inadvertently happen, the word cannot be admissible; the worshipper has to repeat it as it should be pronounced. If the worshipper resorts to this intentionally at the outset, it would invalidate the entire prayer. However, should they do it while pronouncing the word, they have to repeat pronouncing it in a proper way; their prayer would be valid.

This also applies to playing with the other rules of Arabic syntax and grammar.

The worshipper has to maintain the order of the ayahs, be they those of al-Fatiha or the second surah, as they appear in the Holy Qur’an. They should also maintain an unbroken sequence between the ayahs, i.e. there should not be undue pauses between them as well as between any two sentences in one ayah. The criterion here should be judged against the established practice (urf). However, halting the recitation for a cough or the like, albeit long, should not be a problem.

97. d. It is obligatory that the worshipper should recite [the surahs] audibly (jahr) at times, and inaudibly (ikhfat) at others.

Where should each mode of speech used?

It is obligatory on a man to recite al-Fatiha and the second surah in subh prayer, the first and second ruku’ of maghrib and isha’ audibly. He must inaudibly recite al-Fatiha and the second surah in the first and second ruku’ of both dhuhr and asr.

However, it is not obligatory to recite the basmalah inaudibly. It is mustahab that it be recited audibly in each and every prayer. Dhuhr prayer on a Friday can be said in either way. As for Juma’ prayer, the imam has to recite the surahs audibly.

Women have to observe inaudible recitation in the same way men do. As for cases of audible recitation, they have the choice between audible and inaudible recitation.

98. At any rate, the worshippers, be they men or women, should overdo neither. That is, audible reciting should not border on screaming and inaudible reciting should not border on mumbling.

As for utterances, other than al-Fatiha and the second surah, such as takbir, dhikr, tashahhud, etc. the worshipper is free to recite them either audibly or inaudibly.
99. e. Just as the worshippers are required to recite takbir-atul ihram from a standing position, they are required to maintain a standing position while reciting al-Fatiha and the second surah. It is also obligatory on them to maintain a stable position while reciting. However, certain situations may arise where the worshippers are required to move sideways, forward or backward. Provided that they maintain facing the qiblah, they should abandon the recitation at the moment of making the move and resume it after that.

100. Lapses: If the worshippers deliberately do anything which may in any way detract from the recitation, [of that which has so far been discussed], their prayer shall be deemed batil.

However, if they have done so inadvertently or through ignorance, their prayer should be deemed valid. So, if they realized their oversight after they had finished their prayer, they need not worry. The same applies, if the realization occurs during prayer, but after the worshipper had performed ruku' where the lapse in recitation took place. They may become aware of the error prior to actually bowing for ruku'. In such a case, they must take remedial action, unless they no longer maintained stability of the standing position, or audible/inaudible recitation where required, in that they are not required to repeat the recitation so long as the mistake was made either unintentionally or due to forgetfulness or ignorance.

The mukallafs may be [vaguely] aware of the requirements of the two modes of recitation, i.e. audibly or inaudible...
bly. However, on embarking on a particular prayer, they were not sure what mode is actually required of them. Suppose that audible reciting was required, yet they did the reverse, only to discover their mistake, having finished their prayer. A prayer thus performed would still count, provided that, at the outset, they intended that Allah, the Exalted, would accept it as it was recited.

101. Doubt: The worshipper may harbour doubt about the soundness of their recitation of al-Fatiha and the second surah or part thereof. Should this happen, after they have finished the recitation, they do not have to worry.

If the doubt arises about whether the worshipper recited, say, the first ayah of al-Fatiha while they were reciting the second ayah, they should not worry.

If the doubt arises as to whether or not al-Fatiha was recited while the recitation of, say, al-Ikhlas was in progress, they need not worry.

However, it is obligatory to recite al-Fatiha and the second surah, if the worshippers found themselves, immediately after takbiratul ihram, speechless not knowing whether they recited them.

Should the worshippers resolve the doubt that they really did recite al-Fatiha, yet they are at a loss whether they recited the second surah, they must hasten to recite it.

Any doubt about any of the preceding situation which may arise after the worshipper had bowed for ruku' must be ruled out.

102. Decorum: It is mustahab to say, "A'oudhu Billahi Minash Shaitanir Rajim", I seek refuge with Allah from the accursed Satan, before the inauguration of recitation in the first ruku'.

A short pause is also mustahab after the recitation of al-Fatiha, just before reciting the second surah.

It is mustahab to say, "Alhamdu Lillahi Rabil A'lamin", Praise be to Allah, Lord of the Worlds, upon finishing al-Fatiha; also saying, "Kathalikal Lahu Rabi", That is My Lord, upon finishing al-Ikhlas.

It is mustahab that the worshippers recite, in their prayer, once a day at least al-Ikhlas.

Although it is recommended for the worshippers not to recite, after al-Fatiha, two complete surahs of the Holy Qur'an, there is no harm if they chose to do so.

3. Ruku'

Upon finishing the recitation, it is obligatory on the worshippers to perform ruku'. Ruku' is an obligatory part of each and every prayer, be it obligatory or supererogatory, for no rak'a (unit) shall count without the actual bowing act (ruku), showing humility to the Almighty. So, if the bowing was intended to pick up something from the floor, for example, it would not count as ruku'; consequently, the worshipper has to go back to a standing position to execute ruku afresh.

Ruku' has certain requirements:

103. a. It should be performed from a standing position because bending down could be executed from a standing position or from a kneeling one. The obligatory ruku' which is a prerequisite in prayer is the one performed from a standing position.

104. b. The ruku' should follow the recitation from an upright standing position, in that any other ruku' executed from other positions, including a standing one which is not upright, would not do.

105. c. The level of bowing in ruku must be such that the finger tips of the worshippers should reach their knees. If the worshipper's hand was either extraordinarily big or small, their bowing should be on a par with the average worshipper.

106. d. Ruku' must be done once in each rak'a; thus, if two ruku's were performed in any one ruku', the prayer would be rendered batil. Ayat prayer, which has already been discussed in the Chapter on Types of Prayer, para. (194), is an exception because each rak'a of it consists of five ruku's (bowings).

107. e. While maintaining stability in their bowing position for ruku, the worshippers must utter any of these phrases, "Subhana Rabbiyal Adheemi wa Bihamdih", at least once, "Subhanal Lah", "Alhamdu Lillah", "La Ilaha Illal Lah", "Allahu Akbar" at least three times; a sick person can recite it once.

The obligatory stability, or steadiness, in ruku should be achieved in any way possible, even by supporting oneself with a stick or the like.

The obligatory dhikr [tasbeeh] in ruku should be recited in Arabic, giving due attention to things like proper pronunciation and the rules of Arabic syntax. The worshipping are free to recite dhikr audibly or inaudibly.

108. f. On finishing ruku' the worshipper should go back to an upright standing position, maintaining a repose state.

109. Inability to perform ruku' as it should be done: Ruku' is obligatory, even if the worshippers were not in a position to maintain stability while performing it. The same goes for a person who cannot bend fully for ruku' If it is not at all possible to bend, a nod would do. Ruku' from a sitting position would not do.

110. Lapses: If the worshippers skipped any ruku' of a prayer, such a prayer should be deemed batil, irrespective whether they did it intentionally or inadvertantly.

The same goes for abandoning (a) the first of the six obligations, already discussed, such as performing ruku' while sitting, (b) the second: performing ruku' from a sitting position not an upright standing one, (c) the third: not reaching the required level of bending in ruku' and (d) the fourth: by executing two *ruku'*s in any one rak'a.

111. Omitting dhikr while in ruku' could have one of two outcomes. If the worshippers did it deliberately while they are aware that it is obligatory, their prayer should be deemed batil.

If there was no malice, i.e. either due to forgetfulness or sheer ignorance that it is obligatory, the prayer should be valid. In such a case, they are not required to repeat dhikr, if they realized the oversight after lifting their head from ruku.

112. The worshippers may deliberately recite dhikr while not maintaining a calm and collected posture. Their prayer is batil, if they have intended to treat such a dhikr as part and parcel of the prayer. Conversely, this would not detract from their prayer; however, they have to repeat dhikr.

Should this happen due to an oversight or ignorance of the rules, the prayer is valid and the worshippers are not required to repeat dhikr, even if they discovered the omission just before lifting their head from ruku.

The same rule applies to a worshipper not performing dhikr in the proper manner for reasons beyond his control, such as being forced to move or sway in his ruku' because of overcrowding for example.

113. What shall be the position of a worshipper who inadvertently forgot to perform ruku'?

A. If the worshippers realized the omission after they had performed the second of the two sujoods, [no remedy can be applied], in that the prayer is batil. They have to start again.

If the realization takes place before performing the second sujood, they should go back to the upright standing position, perform ruku' and finish their prayer. They are not required to repeat anything, no matter whether or not they entered in the first sujood; Had they done so, they should have considered it cancelled.

114. Doubts: If the worshippers found themselves in a standing position not knowing whether or not they had performed ruku', they must hasten to do it. The same applies in the case of dhikr, in that the worshipper did not know whether or not they recited it while they were still in a bowing position.
115. Doubt about performing ruku' arising while performing sujood, or on the way to performing it after ruku', must be ruled out.

116. After performing ruku' and lifting one's head, one may entertain a doubt whether he has executed ruku' properly, or whether he has recited dhikr as it should be recited. Such doubts should be ruled out.

117. Decorum: It is mustahab for the worshippers to recite takbir by lifting both their hands as close as possible to their ears or to both the sides of their face before actually going into a bowing position for ruku'.

Once assuming a bowing position, it is mustahab for the worshippers to place their hands on their knees - although it is recommended for women to place their hands on their thighs - push the knees backward [as though to straighten the legs], straighten the back, stretch the neck to form a straight line with the back, look at the spot between the feet, repeat tasbih [dhikr] three, five, seven times or more, and utter the phrase, "Sami'al Lahu Limen Hamidah" upon lifting the head from ruku'.

4. Sujood

118. After performing ruku' and going back to an upright standing position, the worshippers have to perform two sujoods, prostrating twice in each and every rak'a of obligatory as well as supererogatory prayer is obligatory. That is, any ruku' would not count if there was no sujood.

By sujoor we mean placing one’s forehead on the earth or what is grown in it as a mark of submission to Allah, the Exalted. This, however, will be elaborated later. Not any placing of the forehead thus is considered sujoor; rather the positioning which is conducive to support, concentration, and leaning not mere touching.

Sujoor has certain requirements:

119. a. The placing of the forehead on the earth should be done in such a way that an area of one inch or slightly less than that of the forehead should come into contact. Thus, it is not sufficient to prostrate on an area equivalent to a pin head of the position of sujoor, for example. Placing the entire forehead or quite a big chunk of it on the earth is not good enough either.

Should the worshipper be nursing an injury in the forehead, he must do his best to place the sound part, if any, on the earth. If this is not feasible priority should be given to one of the two temples for performing sujoor. As a matter of optional ihityar, preference should be given to the right temple. If this was not feasible, using one’s chin in performing sujoor should come next. If all the alternatives are exhausted, a nod would do.

120. b. The worshippers performing sujoor should place the palms of their hands in the place where they are praying. If this was not feasible, the back of the hands would do. For an amputee, the stump would suffice. Placing the finger tips would not do, nor would a clutched hand do. It is sufficient to place the hands on the earth not exactly fully.

121. c. Ensuring that at least part of the knees are secured firmly on the ground.

122. d. Placing the feet toes on the ground.

The forehead, the hands, the knees, and the toes are called the seven body parts of sujood.

123. e. While repose, the worshipper can recite any of the following phrases in their sujood:

"Subhana Rabbiyal A'ala Wabihamdih" at least once, "Subhanal Lah" at least three times. They could choose from the other phrases of dhikr mentioned in Ruku', para. (107); They are free to recite dhikr audibly or inaudibly.

While in sujood, the worshipper must remain in a calm and collected state throughout with the forehead, the hands, the knees, and the toes securely placed in the manner we have just described.

124. A worshipper, in the process of performing sujood, had a rebound of the head which caused his forehead to be raised slightly from the place of sujood; this could have happened inadvertently either before or after dhikr. How should he go about it?

A. If this happened in the first sujood, the sujood should be considered done with. If the worshipper was able to keep steady and prevent his forehead from falling again on the place of sujood, he must go back to a calm and collected sitting position in order to perform the second sujood. If his forehead fell again on the place of sujood through no fault of theirs, he has to lift their head, repeat sujood and carry on with his prayer till the end.

Should this happen in the second sujood, the same should apply.

125. f. Upon lifting his head from sujood, the worshipper must go back to a sitting position and maintaining a state of steadiness and calmness. That is, the sitting position should serve as a springboard to performing the second sujood just as the case in performing ruku' from a standing position which again the worshipper has to be upright and repose.

As a matter of ihtiyat, it is mustahab that the worshipper sits still for a very short time after performing the second sujood. This is so, even if he is not required to attend to any other part of the prayer, such as tashahhud or tasleem; this is true in the case of the first and the third ruku' of a four-rak'a prayer.

126. g. The spot where the worshipper should place his forehead has to be level with their standing position. However, slight unevenness, i.e. not more than a fist (circa 8cm), can be tolerated. What is not required is achieving a level pegging position between the rest of the parts of sujood nor between any one of them, or between the latter and the place of sujood. That is, it is permissible that the place of the hands or knees be below, or above, the level of the place of sujood by a maximum height of a fist. The same goes for disparity of positions of the hands and knees.

127. h. The place where the worshippers should position the seven parts, while performing sujood in prayer, has to be either owned by them, free for all, or owned by someone else who has given him permission to use it. If the place belongs to the others and permission was not granted, the worshipper is not allowed to usurp it to perform sujood in it. Should this happen, the prayer is rendered batil.

Suppose someone usurped a plot of land from another and annexed it to his own house. The usurper stood for prayer on that land. Having shouted takbir, recited al-Fatiha, and performed ruku', he moved few steps to enter into his own territory to ensure that all seven parts of sujood are securely positioned there, i.e. outside the usurped area. His prayer should be in order because judging prayer not in order, and therefore batil, revolves around the place where the worshipper is at the time of sujood.

What we mean by "the place" is the area which the worshipper's body occupies, i.e. not the surroundings, be they walls, roofs, etc. Should these be maghsoub (usurped), the prayer should not be rendered batil, so long as the seven body parts of the worshipper come into contact with the area which is not maghsoub.

If the usurped land was paved with any kind of material or tarmac, that are lawful (mubah), prayer on such a land should be valid. Using any type of furnishing, such as a prayer mat, in order to perform prayer in a usurped place is not sufficient to render the prayer valid.

A prayer of a prisoner, performing it in a usurped place, is valid.

The place where the worshipper intends to perform prayer may not be maghsoub. Yet, it is strongly advisable that he leaves it. It may even become haraam for them to stay there, if it will lead to endangering his physical or spiritual well-being, in that he may commit that which is haraam whether intentionally or inadvertently. If the worshipper goes against this advice, stayed in that forbidden place, and said prayer, such a prayer will not be considered good enough.

Mere suspicion that the place is maghsoub should render any prayer performed there batil, if it was done at will. It is irrelevant if it was discovered later that the place is not really usurped, that it is mubah (lawful), and that it is not out of bounds.

If the place is jointly owned neither partner can say prayer there without the permission of the other party. Should anyone do so, their prayer would be batil.

If the ownership of the land is not known and it is difficult to trace the owner, the Marji' should be approached for permission to say prayer there.

"The permission of the owner" means that they are neither averse to, nor hard pressed in letting you pray. If you have any doubt about that, it is not permissible to say prayer there. If you have peace of mind that the owner does not hate to see you pray, there is no harm in performing prayer there. However, reaching "peace of mind" could materialize either by the owner's declaration, established practice, or the worshipper's own hunch that the owner will not be annoyed to see them pray.

That said, the worshipper could conclude that the owner would not mind that he can have a free hand in his land. Accordingly, the worshipper said their prayer there, only to discover that he was in the wrong. Their prayer is not good enough.

128. i. The worshipper must not perform more than two sujoods in one ruku’. The sujood should only be performed in its place, i. e. not before and not after it is due. That is, if the worshipper deliberately performed, say, three sujoods or the sujood was performed prior to ruku’, it is not permissible and consequently the prayer is deemed batil.

129. j. The place of sujood has to fulfill the following requirements:

j/1. It must be tahir. However, this condition does not include all the area where the worshipper is performing their prayer. If all was najis save the place of sujood, this will be sufficient for the validity of prayer, provided that the najis area or the clothes of worshipper were not wet where it may be conducive to permeating najasah.

j/2. The place of sujood must be solid enough as not to allow the forehead of the worshipper to sink, i. e. not muddy or soft. If it is not solid enough, sujood can be performed, but not with sufficient weight. The worshipper is strongly urged, as a matter of obligatory precaution, to observe this point with regard to all seven parts, i. e. they need to be secured while sujood is being performed.

If the place was soft, yet it would enable the worshippers to secure their forehead in it after exerting some pressure, this would be sufficient. Example: You could place a piece of paper on a furnishing consisting of fluffy cotton. When you place your forehead for sujood on it, it will certainly sink until it reaches a point where it settles. Only there and then you could say dhikr; such a sujood is sound enough.

\(\text{j/3.}\) The thing used for prostration (sujood) should be part of the earth or that which is grown in it, but generally not of that which is eaten or worn. Of no importance too is that which could, seldom or due to an emergency, be eaten or worn. By "eaten or worn", we mean that which is conducive to eating and wearing, albeit it may need processing (cooking) to be eaten, or weaving to be worn.

Among the things that are permissible to perform sujood on are those mentioned in para. (14) of the Chapter on Tayammum.

Suppose a worshipper brought with him something to perform sujood on. Embarking on prayer he lost it. What should he do?

A. Should there be time for prayer, albeit for one ruku, he has to cut the prayer short and resume it [after making available that which can be used for sujood]. Should there be no time, he can use his clothes to perform sujood, irrespective of what fabric they are made of. If this was not feasible, sujood can be performed on anything available [at the time].

Is it permissible to perform sujood on a piece of paper?

A. It is permissible. However, it is preferable, as a matter of voluntary precaution, to avoid using paper made from cotton, flax, or linen, i.e. which are originally forbidden to use for sujood.

A worshipper may mistakenly use a piece of synthetic material in their sujood believing that it is some sort of paper. After performing the first or second sujood they realize that it is not of what is permitted to use for sujood. They are free to either cut short their prayer and start again, or carry on till the end, observing in the latter case that the sujoods that will follow should be performed properly; having opted for this, repeating the whole prayer is recommended on the grounds that it is better as a matter of voluntary precaution.

130. Cases of Disability:

He who cannot bend for sujood should do their best to perform it, even if it calls for raising the place of sujood to the level where they can perform it. That said, the worshipper should ensure that the rest of the body parts be positioned in their respective places on the same level on the floor.

Should the [temporary or permanent] disability be such that the worshipper cannot bend, they or someone else, as the case may be, should raise that which was permitted to perform sujood on to their forehead and nod. If nodding was not possible, an eye wink would suffice.

131. Lapses:

Should the worshipper either omit, or add to, the two sujoods, at any ruku', their prayer shall be deemed batil (void). This is so irrespective of either or not it was done knowingly and deliberately, due to forgetfulness, or through ignorance.

It could happen that a worshipper omits one of the two sujoods. should this be deliberate, the prayer is deemed unsound. However, if it arose from forgetfulness or unawareness of the rules, the prayer is in order. Yet, the worshipper must hasten to do good the sujood they omitted and perform the compensatory sujood-as-sahu. This will be elaborated when we will discuss "the lapses" in the Chapter on "General Guidelines".

If one extra sujood was performed, the prayer shall be considered lacking when it had been done with intent. It will be accepted though, if it was done inadvertently or due to unawareness of the requirements of the procedure.

What would the worshipper do if they omit performing one or two sujoods after they had already stood up for another ruku'

A. If the omission was made in both the sujoods and the realization did not occur until the worshipper had already gone into ruku', the prayer should be deemed batil. If the omission was made in one of the two sujoods and the realization of one's mistake occurred after ruku', they should proceed with the prayer which will then be deemed sound. However, at the end of the prayer, they must perform the one sujood by way of compensation together with sajdah-tay-as-sahu.

Should the omission of one or the two sujoods be discovered before bowing for ruku', the worshipper must hasten to go back to a prostrating position to perform the sujoods they missed. They should then continue their prayer as normal till completion, in which case they are not required to do anything else.

If after tashahhud and tasleem, the worshipper discovered that they forgot to perform one or both the sujoods of the last ruku', what should they do?

A. Among the items listed under the "Nullifiers of Prayer" in the Chapter on "General Guidelines of Prayers" is deliberate action which could render it invalid, such as talking; other nullifiers could be the commissioning of any action, albeit inadvertent, such as that which may require [new] wudhu, [such as breaking wind].

Accordingly, if the worshipper discovered their mistake after tasleem and before embarking on anything which might be considered a nullifier of prayer, they should perform what they had omitted from sujood, say tashahhud and tasleem, provided that not a considerable time has passed which may impinge on the continuity; they do not need to do anything else.

The same applies if the action commissioned was of the first degree, i.e. that which is not done with intent, such as talking. For the second type of nullifiers, there are two possibilities. (a) If two sujoods were omitted, the prayer is batil. (b) If one sujood was omitted, the prayer is in order, provided that the omitted sujood has to be performed, while the worshipper is in a state of taharah alongside sajdatay-as-sahu.

The following lapses do not call for any remedial action: (a) performing sujood after forgetting to say dhikr. (b) saying dhikr without maintaining a repose state while standing. (c) making inadvertent movement while reciting dhikr as is the case in ruku' which has already been discussed.

132. Managing Doubt:

While standing, a worshipper could not decide whether such a standing was after performing the two sujoods of a previous ruku' or they had just lifted their head from a ruku' on their way to perform the two sujoods for the rak'a in hand. They should resolve such a doubt by assuming that their standing is the one before sujoood, in which case they must perform the two su-jooods. On completion, they should rise to a new ruku'.

While in a sitting position, a worshipper could not decide whether they performed one or two sujoods. They must resolve such wavering by performing a second sujood.

Should the same uncertainty arise while the worshipper is on their way from a sitting position to a new ruku', they should not pay attention to such a doubt.

If the doubt arises after standing for a new ruku' or embarking on tashahhud in the second and fourth ruku', they should not pay attention to such a doubt.

If after lifting their head from sujood, a person became doubtful as to the validity of their sujood, they should not worry. Similarly, if the doubt was more to do with the correctness or otherwise of dhikr during sujood.

133. Decorum

After lifting their head from ruku', while still maintaining an upright position, and during the utterance of takbir, it is mustahab for the worshipper to raise their hands to the level of their ears or the sides of their face, before going for sujood.

While performing sujood, it is mustahab to place their nose on something in the same way the seven parts of the body are positioned. Dhikr [tasbeeh] can be repeated three, five or seven times which is the best.

Upon lifting the head from the first ruku' and settled in their sitting position, it is mustahab that the worshipper recites takbir. The same is recommended on the way to performing the second sujood and upon raising the head from the second sujood.

Sujood alone is considered among the greatest acts of worship, provided that it is done exclusively out of submission to Allah Almighty. Hadith has it, "The closest man can be to their Creator is when they are prostrating". Sujood and showing humility before Allah is His exclusive domain, i.e. it is haraam to perform sujood to anyone save Him.

It is obligatory to perform sujood upon reciting or hearing the recitation of any of the four ayahs of sujood which have already been mentioned in para . (42)of the section on Ghusl/Chapter of Taharah. By "recitation", we mean proper pronunciation of the words, in that silent reading has no consequence. Repeating the recitation requires repeated sujoods. Hearing the ayahs recited should imply listening attentively. Listening to the ayahs recited includes live recitation, broadcasting, and playing a tape recorder. In all these cases sujood is obligatory.

Listening to the ayahs recited while in the street or in a car where sujood is not feasible requires the worshipper to nod as a matter of voluntary ihtiyat. Performing sujood should be postponed to the nearest possible opportunity.

That said, one does not have to observe any of the obligations required for the sujood in a usual prayer. Also, it is not obligatory to recite either dhikr, or takbir. Similarly, neither taharah nor facing the direction of qiblah has to be adhered to. The only thing that should be observed is the proper implementation of the sujood itself, i.e. by positioning the forehead, the hands, knees, and feet toes on the floor.

Among the highly recommended (mustahhab) acts of worship is the sujood of thanksgiving (sajdatu-ash-shukr). This could be performed upon the renewal of every bounty and the banishment of every wrath, and upon the bestowal of every success to perform every obligation or carrying out an honourable deed. While in prostration, you should say, "Shukran Lillah" - Praise be Allah once or more. It is most preferable that it is repeated hundred times.

5. Tashahhud and Tasleem

Tashahhud

134. Upon finishing the second sujood of the first rak'a going back to a sitting position, the worshippers should stand up for the second ruku'. Upon finishing the second sujood of the second rak'a, it is obligatory on them to sit and recite tashahhud. Tashahhud means bearing witness that Allah is one and that Mohammad (s. a. w.) is His messenger; also invoking blessing and benediction on the Prophet and his pure progeny. As a matter of obligatory precaution, the wording of tashahhud is as follows, "Ashhadu Alla Illaha Illal Lah, Wahdahu La Sharika Lah, Wa Ashhadu Anna Mohammadan Abduhu Wa Rasuluh, Allahumma Salli Ala Mohammadin Wa Aali Mohammad" - I bear witness that there is no god but Allah and that Mohammad is his servant and messenger. O Lord! bless Mohammad and the Progeny of Mohammad.

If the prayer is a two-\textit{rak'a} one, the worshipper should recite \textit{tasleem} after \textit{tashahhud}, thus bringing it to a close. If it is a three-\textit{rak'a} prayer, the third \textit{ruku'} must be performed after \textit{tashahhud}. On completing it, a second \textit{tashahhud} must be recited followed by \textit{tasleem}. In a four-\textit{rak'a} prayer, the fourth \textit{ruku'}, must immediately be performed after the third one leading to a second \textit{tashahhud} and \textit{tasleem}.

To sum up, \textit{tashahhud} is required once in a two-\textit{rak'a} prayer and twice in a three-\textit{rak'a} and four-\textit{rak'a} one.

135. What is required?

It is obligatory to maintain one's peace and composure while sitting and reciting \textit{tashahhud}. There is no harm though in moving the hand, provided that it does not impinge on the steadiness of the worshipper while they are seated. Thus, it is not permissible to recite it while in the process of raising one's head from \textit{sujood}, nor on the way up to assume a standing position.

It has to be recited in Arabic and without a break or pause. The worshipper is free to recite \textit{tashahhud} either audibly or inaudibly.

Should the worshippers not be in a position to learn how to recite \textit{tashahhud} so much so that they become hard pressed for time, they must seek help from someone who could coach them to do so; they can even read it out from a paper where possible. If this is not feasible, anything which may serve as testament of faith would do. Non-Arabic speakers who cannot say tashahhud in Arabic can recite the equivalent in their mother tongue until they learn how to say it in Arabic.

136. Lapses

If someone is aware that it is not permissible for them to skip tashahhud in their prayer, yet they do so deliberately, such a prayer shall be deemed batil. Should this be done inadvertently or due to ignorance of the rules, the prayer should be in order. That said, to make good such a prayer, the worshipper should recite compensatory tashahhud alongside sajdatay-as-sahu as will be discussed later.

Should the mistake of not saying tashahhud be discovered after rising for the third ruku, what should one do?

A. If the discovery is made before actually bowing down for ruku, the worshipper should take remedial action by going back to a sitting position to say tashahhud and carry on with the rest of the prayer. If the discovery is made after ruku, the worshipper should continue with their prayer till the end. Upon finishing it, they should say compensatory tashahhud and sajdatay-as-sahu.

137. Managing Doubt

If the worshipper found themselves sitting after the second ruku not knowing whether they said tashahhud, they must do so. If the doubt creeps in upon rising for the third ruku, they should go back to a sitting position and say tashahhud. If the same occurs after the worshipper has stood upright for the third ruku, they should continue with their prayer.

The latter ruling applies in such cases as the remembering of the ostensibly omitted tashahhud occurs (a) after embark- ing on tasleem of the last ruku, and (b) after finishing the entirety of tashahhud or part thereof, doubting the propriety of reciting it. No repeat is required.

138. Decorum

It is mustahab for the worshipper to inaugurate tashahhud by saying, "Alhamdu Lillah", or "Bismillahi wa Billah, wal Hamdu Lillah, wa Khairil Asma'ie Lillah", or "Al Asma'ul Husna Kullahe Lillah".

It is also mustahab to say, "Wataqabbal Shafa'atahu Warfa' Darajatah", after saying, "Allahuma Salli Ala Mohammadin Wa'ali Mohammad". It is strongly recommended that the worshipper rests both his hands, with the fingers tucked, on his thighs.

Tasleem

139. Tasleem is the last part of prayer; it follows from tashahhud of the last ruku of each and every prayer. Its completion heralds the end of prayer, and thus the worshipper is free from the restrictions which they are bound by while the prayer is in progress. Accordingly, they can go about their business as usual. This will be elaborated in the section discussing the "Nullifiers of Prayer" in the Chapter on the "General Guidelines of Prayers".

In a two-rak'a prayer tashahhud and tasleem are recited in the end of the second \textit{ruk\u0131}. In a three-\textit{rak\'a} one, both are recited in the end of the third \textit{ruk\u0131}. In a four-\textit{rak\'a} prayer both are recited in the end of the fourth \textit{ruk\u0131}.

There are two texts for \textit{tasleem}. The first is, "Assalamu Alaina Wa Ala Ibadillahis Saliheen" and the second is, "Assalamu Alaikum, Wa Rahmatullahi Wa Barakatuh". The worshipper is free to choose either. However, it is preferable, as a matter of choice, that both are recited, starting with the first one first, immediately followed by the second.

Should both be recited, the first text should be deemed as the obligatory one and second is the voluntary (\textit{mustahab}).

Should the worshippers choose to say, "Assalamu Alaikum" of the second text alone, their prayer should be alright.

All the other conditions, such as sitting calm and collected etc., which should be fulfilled during \textit{tashahhud} have to be met in \textit{tasleem}. All matters applicable to a person with disability or someone who is not aware of the rules in \textit{tashahhud} are applicable in \textit{tasleem}. The worshipper has the choice of reciting \textit{tasleem} either audibly or inaudibly.

140. Lapses

Two situations might arise as a result of forgetting to recite \textit{tasleem}.

a. Provided that the worshippers did not do anything that constitutes a breach of the sanctity of prayer, they can recite \textit{tasleem} which they might have thought had omitted. Such a prayer is deemed in order with the proviso that not a long period had elapsed since they finished their prayer. Conversely, they are not required to recite tasleem, and thus render their prayer valid.

b. If before they discovered their mistake, they had already commissioned that which detract from the validity of prayer, their prayer is apparently in order; that said, repeating it is desirable, as a matter of voluntary ihitiyat. However, if that was not as a result of forgetting to recite tasleem, and the worshipper commissioned that which invalidates prayer, they should repeat it, as a matter of obligatory ihitiyat. This is so, unless the action which invalidated prayer had occurred inadvertently, especially if it was among those actions which do not render prayer void due to the nature of the omission; the prayer is deemed sound.

141. Managing Doubt. If the worshippers were not sure as to whether or not they said tasleem, it is not obligatory on them to do so. That is, if the doubt comes about after a long period had elapsed on prayer; also, if they had commissioned any action which render prayer invalid, i.e. those "nullifiers of prayer" already discussed in para (131). Apart from those two situations, tasleem has to be recited; in doing so, the prayer will then be deemed valid. This includes the doubt as to whether or not tasleem was recited that might have arisen after finishing prayer and embarking on supplication.

If, after finishing tasleem, the doubt has more to do with the propriety or otherwise of tasleem itself, they should disregard such doubt.

142. Decorum

We have already mentioned that it is preferable to combine both the statements in tasleem, better still if they are preceded by, "Assalamu Alaikam Ayyuhan Nabiyyu Wa Rahmatul Lahay Wa Barakatuh".

It is also mustahab that the worshippers place their hands on their thighs while reciting tasleem as in the case of tashahhud.

6. What should be recited in the last two ruku’s?

143. In a three-*rak’*a and a four-*rak’*a prayer the worshipper should, after the tashahhud of the second ruku, rise for the third ruku’ of a three-*rak’*a prayer and for the third and fourth ruku’ respectively of a four-*rak’*a one.

Here, we are going to discuss what the worshipper should recite in those ruku’s, after assuming a standing position with full composure.

The worshipper has the choice of reciting suratul-Fatiha or tashih [dhikr] (Subhanal Lah, wal Hamdu Lillah, wala Illaha Illal Lah, wa Lahu Akbar); reciting this once would suffice. The imam (leader) of prayer and those praying behind him are treated in the same way insofar as tashih is concerned. However, it is most desirable that one should go for tashih.

144. It is obligatory to recite inaudibly in both the third and fourth ruku’. This goes for both the choices, i.e. tashih or suratul-Fatiha. In the latter, the worshipper can recite basmalah audibly. The rules of Arabic phonetics, grammar, and syntax have to be observed. One should maintain his composure and stillness while standing upright and reciting tasbih or al-Fatiha in exact compliance of the procedure in the first two ruku's.

145. If the worshippers intended to recite al-Fatiha, yet they found themselves inadvertently reciting tasbih or vice versa, whatever they uttered shall be deemed in order. In the event of doing such a thing with intent, only to switch to the choice, they are free to do so. The worshippers may think that they are still in the first or second ruku of their prayer, and thus they recite al-Fatiha. However, having finished reciting it, they realize that they are in the third or the fourth ruku. Whatever they had recited would do.

146. Lapses

In case the worshippers knowingly and deliberately flout the rules by performing ruku without reciting either tasbih or al-Fatiha, their prayer shall be deemed null and void (batil). Conversely, if this was done inadvertently or due to unawareness of the rules, the prayer is sound. However, if the worshippers discovered the mistake before actually embarking on ruku, they have to recite that which they are required to recite, even if they were on the way to performing ruku, i.e. they should go back to a standing position to carry out the recitation [of either tasbih or al-Fatiha].

Insofar as the mode of recitation is concerned, nothing is required of the worshipper to either inadvertently or due to ignorance of the rules, recite tasbih of al-Fatiha auditorily. This is so, even if discovering the mistake happens before performing ruku’, i.e. no repeat is required.

147. Managing Doubt

If the worshipper, who is in a standing position in the third or fourth ruku’ of their prayer, harbour any doubt as to whether he recited al-Fatiha or tasbih, it is obligatory on him to do so. Should this happen on the way to bowing for ruku’, he should go back to a standing position to do the recitation. However, if the worshipper has already assumed a bowing position, he should carry on and need not pay attention to the doubt. As for the situation of the worshipper doubting the propriety or otherwise of their recitation after he had finished it, again he must carry on, overruling such a doubt.

148. Decorum It is mustahab for the worshipper to complement tasbih with istighfar, i.e. by saying, "Astaghfirul Laahi wa Atoubu Ilaahi" - I ask Allah's forgiveness and repent to Him, or "Allahuma Ighfir Lee" - O Lord! Forgive me.

7. Qunoot

149. Of the mustahab (voluntary) parts of prayer, any prayer, is qunoot. The worshippers will be rewarded for doing it; that said, no harm would befall them if they abandon it. Literally, qunoot means submission; technically, it is a kind of supplication and praising the Almighty at a specific stage of the prayer. It is *musta-

\( \text{hab} \) in both obligatory and optional prayers.

As to its order in prayer, it follows from the recitation of the second \text{ruku'}, i.e. before actually bowing for \text{ruku'} itself.

There are though few exceptions; because Watr Prayer consists of one \text{ruku'}, the \text{qunoot} should be performed before its \text{ruku'}; Juma' Prayer; because it consists of two \text{qunoots}; please refer to para. (44) of the Chapter on Types of Prayer; the third exception is \text{Eid} Prayer as has been detailed in para. (202) of the above-mentioned Chapter.

There is no particular utterance in \text{qunoot}. Any supplication, \text{dhikr}, praising of, and thanksgiving to Allah would do. The \text{worshipper}'s mistakes in Arabic, both phonetically and grammarmwise, should be tolerated.

If the worshipper forgets to recite \text{qunoot}, only to discover that after rising from \text{ruku'}, he can say it there and then. If remembering the omission occurred on the way to bowing for \text{ruku'}, but just before assuming the actual \text{ruku'} position, one should straighten one's back by going to a standing position to recite it.

It is \text{mustahab} to shout \text{takbir} before \text{qunoot}, and raise one's hands to the level of the face while performing it.

8. Praying from a Standing or Sitting Position

150. In the light of what we have discussed, there seems to be five instances of obligatory \text{iqyam} (standing upright during prayer) in prayer:
a. Upon reciting takbiratul ihram.

b. During the recitation or tasbih.

c. The one that precedes the ruku.

d. The one assumed before the ruku, i.e. from a standing position, not a sitting one.

e. The one assumed after rising from ruku.

Omitting any of these qiyams deliberately and knowingly renders prayer batil.

However, doing it due to an oversight or if the worshipper is unaware of the rules would render prayer batil, if the mistake happens in any of the qiyams listed under (a), e.g. by reciting takbiratul ihram while seated, (c), e.g. performing ruku after rising from a sitting position and (d), e.g. performing ruku while seated.

The prayer will not be deemed batil, if the mistake occurs in any of the qiyams listed under (b), e.g. reciting or uttering tasbih while seated and (e), e.g. by going straight for sujood from a ruku posture without standing upright.

Prayer can be performed from a standing or a sitting position. In the prayer performed from a standing position, the worshipper is required to maintain the five qiyams. The prayer performed from a sitting position is the one conducted while the worshipper is seated from the start, i.e. takbiratul ihram, to finish.

In the five obligatory daily prayers, it is not permissible to switch from a standing posture to a sitting one, unless in an emergency, as will be discussed.

151. Wherever possible there are certain requirements that should be fulfilled by the worshipper conducting prayer from a standing position:

a. Standing straight and upright, in that slouching and leaning right or left is not permissible, nor is spreading one's legs, which would detract from standing upright.

There is an exception though, i.e. the qiyam discussed in para. 150/d, in that the qiyam of the worshipper just about to embark on ruku', [by its very nature], should not require standing straight and upright. What is required is that the worshipper should perform such ruku' from a standing not a sitting position.

b. Standing, i.e. it is not permissible for the worshipper to shout or recite al-Fatiha for example while walking.

c. Maintaining a repose state while standing; the exception here is the third type of qiyam described in para. 150/c, i.e. the qiyam that precedes the ruku'.

It is a condition that the worshipper stands on both their feet. Provided that he fulfils the aforesaid requirements, standing on one foot would suffice.

Neither is it conditional that the worshipper stands independently. Leaning on a wall or suchlike for support would be alright.

152. Instances Where the Worshipper is Unable to Pray from a Standing Position.

In such a case the worshippers should do their level best to maintain a standing position in the light of the following:

a. Should it be within their ability to maintain qiyam, but unable to bow for ruku', they are advised, as a matter of ihtiyat, to say prayer twice, i.e. praying once from a standing position and substituting ruku' with a nod, and a second time again from a standing position and performing ruku' from a sitting position.

However, nodding would suffice can be tolerated as a matter of voluntary option (al aqwa).

b. The worshippers may start their prayer from a standing position and be able to maintain qiyam, yet they are neither able to bow for ruku' nor conduct a ruku' from a sitting position. Such people have the choice of either praying from a standing position and nodding for ruku' or praying from a sitting position. In such a case, they should chose the first alternative.

c. Should the worshippers be in a position to maintain qiyam, without fulfilling the aforesaid requirements, it is obligatory on them to do so to the best of their ability, in that it is not permissible for them to pray from a sitting position.

d. If the worshipper cannot sustain qiyam throughout prayer, it is obligatory on them to maintain it during the early ruku's until such a time comes that they can no longer be able to do so, in which case they must revert to a sitting position. Should they be able to regain strength, they must resume the standing position, and so on.

e. Should the worshipper be entirely unable to maintain qiyam, they should resort to praying from a sitting position.

However, having said prayer from a sitting position only to be in a position some time later to say it from a standing position, the worshipper must, time permitting, hasten to repeat the prayer in the case of (e), so as the case in (a) and (b). As for case (c), a repeat is obligatory in the event of the worshipper having the confidence, at the outset, to maintain obligatory qiyam. Conversely, no repeat shall be due.

Case (d) again hinges on the confidence of the worshippers when they first set out for prayer. Should they be in a position to predict that they would be able to pray from a standing position later in the time allotted, their remedial action should be to repeat the prayer. Otherwise, they must take into consideration what they have missed of qiyam; if it was the first, the third, or the fourth type [discussed in para. 150], a repeat prayer shall be obligatory. Otherwise, it shall not.

153. The worshipper opting for saying prayer from a sitting position must observe all the requirements called for during qiyam in a prayer performed from a standing position, i.e. sitting repose, upright, and straight.

In case prayer from a sitting position is not feasible, the worshippers should resort to lying on their right side, facing the qiblah with their upper body in the same way a dead person is laid to rest. If this not conceivable, lying on the left side should be taken up. Should this not be possible, the worshippers should perform prayer lying on their back, with the soles of their feet pointing to the qiblah, in the same way a dying person is made to lie.

Worshippers praying while lying on their side or back can nod for ruku' and sujood. However, nodding for sujood must be conducted in such a way that it should be lower than that done for ruku'. If nodding is not feasible, an eye wink would do.
9. How Should the Parts of Prayer Be Carried out?

The Order of Parts

154. The lawful order of all the parts in prayer must be observed, for each of which has its own slot in the chain. Thus, it is not permissible to embark on any part prematurely. Whosoever, deliberately and knowingly, contravene this rule, by, for example, performing sujood before ruku’ or tashahhud before sujood, their prayer would be deemed batil.

There is a case for the worshipper who, either inadvertently or through ignorance of the rules, does not adhere to the order of the parts of prayer. The following lapses may occur. (a) performing two sujoods before actually performing ruku’, (b) performing a new ruku’ before performing sujood for a previous ruku’, (c) performing ruku’ before reciting takbiratul ihram, or (d) any other action that detracts from the order. Contravening the order in the first three instances would render prayer batil. Otherwise, it would not.

Succession of the Parts

155. It is to be noted that some parts of the prayer are performed successively and others are interrupted by short pauses, such as in the case of rising from ruku’ and waiting for a minute or so until finding something to perform sujood on. In a third instance, the interruption could take such a considerable time that prayer, as a whole unit, can no longer be considered viable. The latter is not permissible, and would render prayer batil, regardless of whether the mistake was made intentionally or inadvertently. It is desirable that prayer is performed according to the first two modes, although it is most desirable that it is performed according to the first form.

Epilogue

a. Commissioning Extra Things in Prayer

156. It is not permissible for the worshipper to add anything extra to the prayer's legally required parts. Such extras could take the following forms:

1. Performing two rak'as or three sujoods in any one ruku, irrespective of the motive for the extra rak'a or sujood, i.e. by considering it part of the prayer or in the case of the extra sujood being intended for thanksgiving, for example.

2. Repeating any parts of prayer, other than ruku or sujood, by way of meaning the repeat to be part thereof, such as reciting suratul-Fatiha twice or performing tashahhud twice, this would be deemed an increase. However, if the second recitation is intended as a mere Qur'anic recitation, or the second tashahhud as sort of remembrance of Allah and His Messenger and a supplication, it would not be considered an extra part.

3. Deliberately commissioning that which is not of prayer, both in utterance and movement, intending it to be part thereof is considered an extra action. For example, cracking one's fingers or closing the eyes. However, doing any of these or others for any other reason, should not be an addition, in which case it would not detract from the sanctity and validity of prayer, unless the action impinges on the overall image of prayer.

Whosoever intentionally and knowingly sets out to introducing anything, of that which has just been discussed, to their prayer, would risk rendering it batil. Doing so inadvertently or for being unaware of the rules would not render prayer null and void, apart from performing an extra ruku' or extra sujood in one rak'a.

b. The Best Manner of Conducting Prayer

157. Allah, the Exalted, says: "Successful indeed are the believers, who are humble in their prayer". (23/1-2). It has been reported from the Prophet (p.) and the Imams (a. s.), in a number of hadiths, that the most importance of the worshipper's prayer will be those parts of it which will be accepted, that one should not embark on prayer unwillingly out of lethargy, and that one should not embark on prayer with an occupied mind; they should set their heart on their Lord, abandoning every earthly affair. Prayer is a means to having audience with Allah and thus the worshipper should be humble before Him, showing fearfulness, submissiveness, and tranquillity, aspiring to all that which would make them cherish His bounty and mercy.

It has also been related that when Imam Ali bin al-Hussain (a. s.) used to embark on prayer he resembled a tree trunk in its stillness, i.e. nothing moved except that which the wind fluttered. When Imams al-Baqir and as-Sadiq (a. s.) embarked on prayer, their colour kept changing from red to yellow and vice versa as though they were whispering to that whom they could see.

When the worshipper inaugurates prayer with the shout of (Allahu Akbar), he should live the full meaning of this phrase, in that this world and all what it resembles should become trivial in his eyes. And when the worshipper recites (Iyyaka Na'budu wa Iyyaka Nastā'īn), he should be truthful with his Creator, in that he should not be slave to his whims and not seek support from any other save from Him.
Chapter Five:

General Guidelines

Foreword

There are rules which are designed to regulate the daily prayers, in that they do not cover other prayers, such as qasr (shortened) prayer required by the travelling person. There are other rules, however, which are not confined to daily prayers; they extend to cover other prayers, such as judging any prayer batil, if the worshipper commissioned any action (hadath) that impinges on the requirement of prayer.

Another rule which straddles daily prayers and other types of prayer is that of qadha, as in the prayer of ayat sometimes. A third example is that of congregational prayer, in that in so much as it is lawful in the daily prayer, so it in Eid prayers, Ayat prayers, and Istisqa prayer.

The first category of rules has been covered in the Chapter dedicated to Daily Prayers. Here we will concentrate on the second category as follows:

a. Nullifiers of prayer.

b. Qadha.

c. Lapses.

d. Doubt.

e. Congregational prayer.

f. The differences between obligatory and supererogatory prayers.

1. Things that Nullify Prayer

In all its forms, save that said for the dead, prayer would be rendered null and void (batil) if certain things take place while it is being said. Some of these would unequivocally render prayer batil, whereas others would make it incumbent on the worshipper to repeat their prayer, as a matter of obligatory precaution:

1.a. The worshipper may, during prayer, do or get subjected to that which detracts from its sanctity, thus requiring them to perform wudhu or ghusl. Whether the encroachment happens deliberately or inadvertently, in the beginning or in the end of prayer is immaterial. The worshipper has to repeat his prayer as a matter of ihitiyat.

2. b. Deliberately turning ones face or body away from the qiblah should render prayer batil, regardless of whatever remedial action the worshipper takes. However, in the event of oversight, the prayer should not be considered batil, except for two situations, (a) if he discovers the omission/commission before the end of time of prayer; should he remember after that, he is not required to repeat the prayer, and (b) the turning away from qiblah is so acute that he turns his back, their right or left side to it. Any veering from qiblah which is less than 90 degrees (right angle) can be tolerated.

3. c. Should the worshippers do that which would encroach upon the form and content of prayer, this would render it batil. Whether the action committed came about deliberately, involuntarily, or inadvertently is irrelevant. For example, dancing, or going about ones business in the usual manner - a mother suckling her baby, a doctor attending to his patient... etc.

There is no harm in making slight movements during prayer, provided that it maintains its general look. Movements such as pointing to something with a wave of a hand, putting something on the head or removing it, bending to pick something up, slight walking sideways, provided that the worshipper maintains facing the qiblah. It is permissible to kill harmful animals, such as scorpion and snake [should they pose danger to you].

4. d. Laughter renders prayer null, whether done voluntarily or in involuntarily. Should laughter come about inadvertently, it shall not detract from prayer.

Smiling, albeit deliberate, will not render prayer batil, neither will giggling.

5. e. As a matter of ihityat, weeping would render prayer null, if any of the following was present, even if it comes about unwillingly:

a. Tearfulness, even though without sobbing.

b. The motivation for weeping is personal, such as bereavement. Should the motive be spiritual, it would not detract from prayer. For example, crying out of submission to Allah, yearning to obtain His pleasure, or pleading with Him to facilitate a pressing matter.

c. Weeping while the worshipper is aware that prayer is in progress. Crying without due awareness to the fact that they are praying should not detract from the validity of prayer.

6. Eating and drinking, irrespective of whether it would affect the form and content of prayer.

However, in Watr Prayer the worshipper, who is thirsty and intending to fast, can walk two or three steps to drink water and return to his place of prayer to finish it. That is, if the water was close to him, and only if time was pressing.

There is no harm in the worshipper swallowing remnants of food left in his mouth.

7. Talking in prayer is forbidden, albeit uttering one letter or sound that may or may not make sense and regardless of whether or not the worshipper was addressing someone. However, unintentional talk can be tolerated.

There is no harm in coughing, clearing one's throat, yawning, puffing etc.

The exception to talking in prayer can be any of the following:
8. a. If speech is of the sort that is addressed to Allah, the Most High, by way of whispered prayer (munajat).

9. b. If it is a kind of dhikr or supplication, provided that it is not addressed to Allah, the Exalted, in that if the worshipper were to say, "Ghafaral Lahu Lak!" - May Allah forgive you, the prayer will be rendered batil. That is, although the expression is a kind of dua (supplication), yet it is meant for someone other than Him. Saying, "Ighfir Lee" - O Allah! forgive me, or "Ghafaral Lahu Liabi" - May Allah forgive my father, should not render prayer batil.

10. c. If speech is confined to reciting verses from the Holy Quran, it will not detract from the validity of prayer.

11. d. Returning a Muslim’s salutation in kind is allowed, i.e. by repeating such expressions as, "As-Salamu Alaik, Salamun Alaik, or As-Salamu Alaikum". If the greetings took such expressions as, "Alaikas Salam, or Alaikumus Salam", the worshipper is free to return the salutation in the manner they prefer, i.e. starting or ending with the word, "Alaika" or "Alaikum".

If the worshipper cannot make out the exact expression, they are free to use, "Salamun Alaikum" or "Alaikumus Salam". However, as a matter of ihtiyat, returning the salutation, using the Quranic expression, "Salamun Al-aikum" is desirable, even if the words of the salutation were different.

Should the worshipper choose not to return the greeting, their prayer can still be valid, although they are deemed negligent.

12. Ignorance of the rules shall not render the prayer of the worshipper batil, apart from those things that invalidate prayer discussed in paras. (1/a) and (2/b) and that which may derogate the form and content of prayer.

13. Crossing the hands while reciting in prayer is not called for. If the worshippers resort to it as though it is required and liked by the Law-giver, they would commit that which is haraam. However, he who does it without intending it to be part of prayer, his prayer is valid. If he meant it to be part thereof, his prayer is invalid, as a matter of ihitiyat, unless he mistakenly thought that it was part of prayer.

The same goes for saying, "Aamin" - Amen, after the recitation of suraratul-Fatiha.

If the worshipper harbours any doubt whether they have committed anything that could have invalidated prayer, they should ignore such doubt.

14. Interrupting optional prayer can be tolerated. Obligatory prayer should not be interrupted as a matter of obligatory precaution. That is, only in an emergency or for a justifiable need. For example, a worshipper, who is alone in the house, and while praying, they hear knocking on the door or the telephone ringing; since it is important for them to know who the caller is, and that continuing prayer would deny them the opportunity to do so, they are justified in interrupting the prayer.
2. Saying Prayer by Way of Qadha

Although the words "ada and qadha" could have different meanings, from a jurisprudence perspective we mainly use "ada" in the sense that performing the required thing in its prescribed time without delay. "qadha" is performing the required thing after its time has passed by way of compensation. For example, we describe a worshipper who performed Asr prayer before the sunset as "having performed it ada"; should they postpone its performance until after sunset, he is described as "having performed it qadha".

What can be performed qadha?

15. It is obligatory to perform, by way of qadha, the five obligatory daily prayers in the event of missing any one of them. It is obligatory also to perform Ayat Prayer qadha in all the cases except one, i.e. where the eclipse, of the moon or sun, is a full one. However, should the mukallaf be unaware of the eclipse, no qadha is required. It is obligatory though in all the other instances.

16. It is mustahab to say, by way of qadha, the supererogatory daily prayers that the worshipper did not say on time.

17. Again it is mustahab to say, by way of qadha, other missed seasonal, i.e. timely supererogatory prayers, such as the prayer of the first of the month. The exception is Eid prayers, in that they cannot be said qadha as will be discussed.

18. If a nadhr gave rise to any supererogatory prayer becoming wajib which was not said on time, it has to be said qadha as a matter of obligatory precaution.

19. No qadha is required in these cases, (a) Juma prayer;
Dhuhr must be performed in lieu, (b) Eid prayers, (c)
Non-timely supererogatory prayers, unless it is desirable that the mukallaf who had made a vow (nadhr) to perform one of them in a particular time to do so. Failing that they have to resort to saying it qadha; Should they choose not to do the latter they would not be deemed sinful.

Why should one say qadha prayer?

20. The reason why the worshippers should resort to saying prayer by way of qadha is their missing out on performing the prayer properly on its prescribed time.
This could come about as a result of an either an outright omission on the part of the worshipper, or they may have performed it, yet without due care to fulfilling the legal requirements, and thus rendering it void.

21. Not everyone who misses prayer has to perform it qadha. This depends on one of two factors:

a. The person’s duty might be that he should say the particular prayer in a given time, yet he did not discharge his obligation either out of rebellion, forgetfulness, or ignorance of the rules. He, then, has to compensate for it. The exception being that the unbeliever who has been brought up thus; he is not required to compensate for any prayer he had abandoned because he was not required to perform prayer to start with. As for the Muslim who had turned apostate and thus turned his back to prayer, he has to perform prayer by way of qadha.

b. The obligation on the person to say the particular prayer may have been waived at the time due to the absence of the third condition of the general precepts, i.e., the ability to carry it out. Such people should say prayer by way of qadha irrespective of the nature of their inability, i.e., whether or not they have control over it; for example a sleeping person who could not get up for prayer and another whose reason for not praying on time could have been non-availability of water for wudhu or dust for tayamum. That said, resorting to qadha in this instance is recommended on the basis of ihtiyat which should not be forsaken.

In all these cases, qadha is obligatory. However, the patient who became unconscious due to no fault of his is a special case.

22. In the light of the above, it is apparent that those who miss out on prayer because they were young—i.e., before attaining adulthood—insane, in haydh or nifas are not required to say compensatory prayers. That is, they are not required to do so at the outset because of their respective situations at the time of prayer.

23. The moment the circumstances change, i.e., the person attains adulthood, the insane becomes sane, the unconscious comes around, and the unbeliever embraces Islam, it is incumbent on each one of them to say prayer. That is, even though there is only sufficient time for just one ruku and with tayamum instead of wudhu. Failure to comply with that would give rise to saying prayer qadha. Should there not be enough time for even one ruku when the circumstances changed, no prayer is called for, neither ada nor qadha.

24. The time for prayer may set in while the woman is in haydh. However, she may find herself tahir before the end of time. She may take one of the following courses of action:

a. Should her period come to an end while there is still time for ghusl and prayer, she must hasten to do so. Failing to comply will give rise to saying prayer qadha.

b. Should there not be ample time for ghusl, rather for tayamum, she should opt for tayamum and say her prayer. If she does not, she has to resort to praying qadha.

25. The time for prayer may set in while the worshipper is still in sound health. Should the worshipper experience a bout of insanity or unconsciousness within the time allotted for prayer before he could say prayer, it is obligatory on him to say it by way of qadha after he restore his health. That is, if the period prior to the bout was sufficient for a full prayer and it was within the worshipper's ability to make himself tahir for it before the onset of time. Conversely, no qadha is required.

The same goes for a woman in haydh in the same circumstances just discussed.
How should qadha prayer be conducted?

26. Prayer performed by way of qadha must be carried out in exactly the same way as though it is being performed ada. So, if the worshipper missed a prayer while on a journey (musafir), he should compensate for it by way of qasr, even if he reached his home town and vice versa, i.e. insofar as tamam prayer goes.

The time for prayer may set in while the worshipper is away on a trip. He returns home before the end of time and still could not pray. It is obligatory on him to perform it qadha and tamam in the light of their circumstances at the end of time. If the situation was the opposite, he should perform it qasr.

27. There is no set time for performing qadha prayer. The worshipper who is required to perform qadha prayer can do so at any time they choose. It is not obligatory on him to hasten to perform it. Postponing it can be tolerated, unless he becomes negligent.

28. The worshippers could have missed more than one prayer. They could be two. If, for example, they were dhuhr and asr for one day or maghrib and isha for one evening, they should start with dhuhr before asr and with maghrib before isha. Should they be different, the worshippers are free to use any order they prefer.

Accordingly, if, for example, there was a backlog of prayers for one year or one month, the worshippers can say qadha prayer, starting with this order: Subh, dhuhr, asr, maghrib, and isha. They may opt for another way, in that they could start with any outstanding prayer, say subh, till it is done with, i.e. for the whole period, then with _dhuhr_ and so on.

29. Managing Doubt

In the event of uncertainty whether the worshippers performed a previous prayer, they are not required to perform it. The worshippers could be aware that they had missed out on prayer at an early stage of their life, yet they are not sure whether they had attained adulthood then. It is not obligatory on them to perform any prayer by way of _qadha_.

The worshippers could be aware that they missed a prayer, yet they are not sure whether it was _subh, dhuhr, or maghrib_. In this case, they should perform three different prayers, i.e. a two-_raka_, a three-_raka_, and a four-_raka_, respectively. Should the worshipper not be in a position to tell whether the missed prayer was _dhuhr, asr, or isha_, they should say a four-_raka_ prayer and feel free to recite audibly or inaudibly.

If the worshippers are uncertain about the number of prayers they missed, they should always resort to the lesser number. For example, if the number was five or more praying five times would do.

Rules Concerning Qadha Prayer

30. A situation may arise whereby a worshipper has two prayers to deal with, one whose time has passed and another whose time is still not up. He may have the choice of starting with either, unless the time for the existing prayer was so short that he fears it might run out, if they started with the compensatory prayer (qadha) first. For example, if the missed prayer was that of subh, which was not performed until it was time for dhuhr, it is permissible for the worshipper to say dhuhr then subh, by way of qadha, unless the time for dhuhr was critical.

31. Q. Suppose a person is required to say a prayer or prayers by way of qadha. This may be due to the fact that (a) he cannot perform them properly; (b) he may not be in a position to perform wudhu, resorting to tay-amum instead; (c) it could be that he can only perform those prayers from a sitting position. Can he be justified in saying them while he is in a bad shape?

A. Should he be confident that he would regain good health, he is better advised to delay saying the outstanding prayers till then. Conversely, he can say those outstanding prayers in the manner commensurate to his condition.

Q. Following on from this answer, suppose the worshipper opted for saying the outstanding prayer from a sitting position because of his prevalent state of health, only to recover and regain good health. Should he repeat the prayers he performed by way of qadha?

A. Yes, he should, since the way he conducted his prayer was lacking due to his own doing. Such a drawback is not excusable even for an ignorant person. However, rules governing lapses in prayer will deal with, [among other things], this point in particular, i.e., when a person who is not aware of the laws can be excused for mistakes they make in prayer.
Saying Prayer on Behalf of One’s Father

32. Just as it is obligatory on the mukallaf to say, by way of qadha, the prayer they missed, so are they obliged to say the prayer which their fathers, and not their mothers, had missed. Apparently, the obligation covers those prayers the fathers had missed either for a good reason or deliberately due to an emergency. That is, it does not extend to cover lifetime wilful abandonment of prayer, as is the case of some fathers who never contemplate clearing the backlog of unperformed prayers. The obligation, however, takes into consideration whether or not it was in the father’s ability and power to say, by way of qadha, the outstanding prayer, in that the sons are not obligated to perform those prayers their fathers had missed because of illness.

It is obligatory that the mukallaf be male and that the father has no other living son older than him at the time of the fathers death. The daughter and the youngest boy are exempt of such an obligation. However, if the eldest son was below the age of adulthood, he is not responsible for carrying out qadha prayer on behalf of the dead father. That said, once the son attains adulthood, it is advisable, on the basis of obligatory precaution, to perform qadha prayers.

Should there be two sons of the same age born to the same father, e. g. from two different mothers, they are jointly responsible for qadha prayer on behalf of their father. If one of them shoulders the responsibility, this will absolve the other of it; otherwise both of them will be deemed guilty. Sharing out qadha prayer between them would do.
In the event of twins, the qadha prayer on behalf of the father should be the sole responsibility of the one who was born first.

The father may stipulate in his will that someone be hired to perform qadha prayer on his behalf paid by money from his own estate. If the will is executed, the son should be absolved of the responsibility.

It is permissible for the son who is obligated with performing qadha prayer for his father to hire someone for this purpose with his own money, if the father had not instructed in his will that it be met from his bequeathable one-third share. Otherwise, it is possible that payment for the person hired can be taken from the father’s share.

If the son is uncertain whether or not there were any outstanding prayers that were due on the father, he should not pay attention to that. However, if the son is certain that his father was indebted with prayers, yet is not sure whether the father had performed them before his death, he should perform such prayers.

3. Lapses

The worshipper may detract from his prayer by commissioning unlawful actions; this could be deliberate and with full knowledge; it could be due to an oversight, or ignorance of the laws. We have already discussed many of these lapses and the remedial action to put them right in their respective places. However, we turn now to a number of lapses, men-titioning their rules, and explaining the general precepts these rules are based on.

33. If the worshipper deliberately and knowingly fails to fulfil their duty by abandoning any part of prayer or any requirement thereof, his prayer shall be deemed ba-til because it will be incomplete.

34. Should the worshipper deliberately and knowingly add anything to prayer that is not originally called for, his prayer shall be considered void (batil) as has already been discussed in para. (156) of the Chapter on General Guidelines.

Beyond the deliberate and flagrant action, there are cases of omission or commission where the prayer will not be rendered batil, whereas there are others where the prayer will be rendered batil.

Situations Where Prayer is Deemed Batil at any Rate

35. Any of the following should render prayer batil:

a. Skipping takbiratul ihram either inadvertently or through ignorance and realizing such an oversight during or after prayer.

b. Omitting ruku leading to the performance of the second sujood and realizing such a mistake during or after prayer.

c. Leaving the two sujoods aside, and rising for the next ruku, then remembering the oversight.

d. Not standing upright at the moment of shouting takbiratul ihram, doing it from a sitting position without being duly excused to do so.

e. Performing ruku from a sitting position with no apparent reason to do so.

f. Performing ruku after rising from a sitting position not from a standing one.

g. Saying prayer without the required wudhu, ghusl, or tayamum; also breach of one’s state of taharah while praying.

h. Commissioning that which would encroach upon the form and content of prayer.

i. Unintentionally, praying while still in a state of najasa which is not allowed.

j. Performing a double ruku in any one raka.

k. Performing four sujoods in any one raka.

l. Setting one’s face to any direction other than qiblah, being unaware of the rules requiring such an action.

m. Should the worshipper be aware that facing the direction of the qiblah is obligatory in prayer, yet they momentarily forgot, leading him not to face the qiblah, his prayer is batil.

n. Setting one’s face to the right, left, or opposite direction of the qiblah in the mistaken belief that he was facing the right direction. Realizing one’s mistake before the time of prayer is up would render prayer batil.

o. Performing prayer before the onset of its time for any reason, i.e., it could be due to an oversight, ignorance, or mistakenly believing the time had come. The same goes for starting prayer slightly ahead of its time, except for one case which has already been discussed in para. (78) of the Chapter on The Five Daily Prayers

Cases Where Prayer Shall not be Deemed Void

Any omission or shortcoming on the part of the worshippers giving rise to what could be a breach of prayer could be tolerated, if they were either ignorant or unaware of the law or the omission was made inadvertently.

Such incidences are of two types: (a) Those omissions which could be rectified as soon as they come to the attention of the worshipper. Once remedial action is taken the worshippers can then continue with their prayer. (b) Those slips which do not require the worshippers to take remedial action, making do with their incomplete prayer.

Situations Where Remedial Action is Called for

36. These are:

a. Dropping part of suratul-Fatiha or the surah that follows it. Should the omission be noticed before the ruku (bowing down) of the raka in hand, reciting the part/s that were inadvertently missed and the parts that follow is called for; thus, one can continue the prayer.

b. Missing any part of that which should be recited [of the Holy Quran] or tasbih [dhikr] in the third and fourth raka. If realizing the omission comes about before actually going for the ruku in hand, the warshippes should recite the parts he omitted and those that follow them, that done they should continue their prayer.
c. Leaving ruku out. Should the worshipper remember what they have done before performing the second sujood of the ruku in hand, they should hasten to rise to a standing position to perform the missed ruku, then continue the prayer.

e. Forgetting to recite tashahhud. Should the worshippers become aware of such an oversight before actually performing ruku, they should go back to a sitting position to recite tashahhud, then continue the prayer.

f. Omitting either the two sujoods, tashahhud, or tasleem of the last ruku. If the worshippers become aware of their mistake before either doing that which could encroach on their state of taharah or impinge on the form and content of prayer, they can perform what they have missed till the end of prayer.

Situations Where Remedial Action is not Called for

37. These are:

a. Dropping recitation, i.e. al-Fatiha or the second surah or part thereof, or that which should be recited in the third and fourth ruku, i.e. al-Fatiha or tasbih or part thereof. Becoming aware of such an oversight after one has actually performed ruku, does not warrant any remedial action. Thus, prayer should be proceeded with.

b. Rising from ruku or sujood only to realize that you did not recite dhikr. No remedial action is called for; the worshipper should move on.

c. Omitting the second sujood of any raka, the middle tashahhud or part thereof, leading to a new ruku. No immediate remedial action is called for; the worshipper should move on. However, having finished his prayer, the worshipper should repeat, by way of qadha, what he has omitted as will be discussed.

d. Skipping the second sujood, tashahhud, or tasleem of the last ruku. Should recognizing one’s mistake occur after some considerable time has elapsed on the prayer so much so that the grain of prayer could no longer be maintained, the prayer would stand, provided the part which has been missed is repeated by way of qadha in the manner that will be discussed.

e. Abandoning standing upright for recitation, only to do so from a sitting position. Should the worshippers realize such an omission after they have done with recitation, it is not obligatory on them to take any remedial action. They should, therefore, move on.

Explaining Terminology

38. Any obligation of prayer, the omission of which would render it batil, is called rukn (fundamental part of prayer). How the omission comes about, i.e., as a result of an oversight or ignorance, is immaterial.

The same goes for any rukn that could be committed to the elements of prayer, apart from takbiratul ihram, in that adding more of it should not render prayer batil, if it is not done with intent.

Any obligation of prayer, the omission of which would not render it batil, unless it is done deliberately and knowingly, is described as non-rukun.

Any obligation of prayer that is a sub-part of a particular part of it, is part of the latter and not directly considered among the parts of prayer. This is because it derives its being obligatory by virtue of being part thereof.

For example, dhikr of a sujood is part of sujood, whereas tashahhud is an independent part of prayer.

Other examples of the obligation of the sub-part of a part is dhikr while performing ruku and standing upright while reciting; the latter being part of recitation. Maintaining a calm and collected posture during recitation of dhikr is part of dhikr. The same goes for maintaining such a posture during recitation, tashahhud, or tasleem. Reciting audibly or inaudibly, as may the case be, is another example.

39. Accordingly, we can deduce the formula for situations where remedy must be applied because it has to be taken where possible, which is the case in the majority of cases, apart from the following:

40. a. The worshipper has, before realizing his mistake, already moved on to another rukn, in which case he is in no position to take remedial action because this action, as we have already mentioned, involves making good what he omitted and repeat the part that followed from it. That is, should he chose to embark on the remedial action irrespective, he would be repeating that rukn which is deemed an infringement. Hence the expression of the jurist, "The time for remedial action is up".

41. b. The omitted obligation is a sub-part of a part and the worshipper is done with that part. For example, the worshipper may have forgotten to recite dhikr [tasbih] for the second sujood after he lifted his head from the spot of sujood, in which case it is too late to take remedial action. That is, if they were to recite dhikr without the actual sujood, it is worthless, because dhikr is part and parcel of sujood not alien to it.

42. c. No remedial action can be taken after the worshipper is done with his prayer so much so that the flow of prayer has been disrupted. This could be said of the prayer which has been finished for some time, or the worshipper may have committed that which constituted a breach of wudhu or ghusl.

43. In each case where remedial action is impossible, prayer is rendered batil, should the skipped part be rukn. If the omitted part is an obligation but not rukn, the prayer stands, provided it is completed.

In the same vein, in each case where remedial action is possible, it has to be embarked on, rendering prayer valid; should the worshipper opt for non-compliance, his prayer would be deemed batil.

What if the worshipper is uncertain about taking remedial action?

44. Some parts of the prayer fall in a grey area, in that there is no clear-cut description whether they are obligations in part or integral parts thereof. Example of this placing of the hands, knees, and feet toes on the prayer mat while performing sujood.

The remedial action here follows where one stands. One may take the view that such action is part of sujood. In this case, the worshipper who did, due to an oversight, not place his hand on the mat, and realized what he had done after lifting their head from the spot of sujood, should not take remedial action. Conversely, if you took the view that it is part of prayer, and not sujood, taking remedial action becomes obligatory; thus performing sujood again properly should be opted for.

However, since one cannot draw the distinction, the mukallaf is advised to continue with his prayer, in the event of such a doubt, without resorting to taking remedial action, provided that he repeats the prayer, albeit it is not obligatory, because the disputed obligation is apparently part of sujood not prayer.

Compensating (Qadha) for Missed Parts

45. In the event of inadvertently skipping one sujood or tashahhud or part thereof, one has to move one, should there be no scope for remedial action. The worshipper has to compensate for the missed part/s by performing same. That said, the worshipper has to be in a state of taharah when performing the missed parts as well as observing the requirements of facing the qiblah and dressing up properly as though he is performing actual prayer. Holding niyyah of performing the missed parts, by way of compensation, is another requirement.

As a matter of voluntary obligation, performing compensatory sujood and tashahhud on the one hand, and the prayer on the other should not be interrupted by anything which may deem prayer batil; also we must reiterate that there should be no other skipped parts where qadha is called for.

Sujood-as-sahu

Sujood-as-sahu (The prostrations in lieu of any omission or commission of a secondary act in prayer).

46. Any omission or commission of a part of prayer that would necessarily give rise to rendering prayer batil, the worshipper will have no alternative but to repeat same. If the omission or commission is of the type that would not infringe prayer, the worshipper should, upon realizing his slip, take remedial action. Should it be too late for that, he can carry on with his prayer which should be valid.

However, there are certain situations which warrant the performance of sajdatay-as-sahu:

47. a. When is it obligatory to perform sajdatay-as-sahu? Sajdatay - as - sahu become obligatory on the worshipper in the following situations:

a. The worshipper unintentional talking during prayer or in the belief that he has finished it.

b. Inadvertently reciting tasleem not in its proper slot, such as reciting it after the first [middle] tashahhud in a four-raka prayer.

c. Faced with uncertainty as to the number of ruku, i.e. between four and five and five and six, as will be discussed in paras. (70) and (74) of the Rules Governing Doubt.

d. Forgetting one sajdah, or tashahhud as a whole or in part, would, as a matter of obligatory precaution, warrant performing what has been missed alongside sajdatay-as-sahu.

e. Omission of qiyam or performing an extra one. An example of this is performing qiyam in a sitting position and vice versa. [Our ruling on] this is based on obligatory precaution.

48. How should one perform sujood-as-sahu?

Two consecutive sujoods should be performed in the same way any two sujoods of any prayer are performed. However, facing the qiblah, taharah, clothing, and takbir are not obligatory. Yet, niyyah of qurbah and securing the hands, knees, and feet toes on the floor are obligatory. The spot where sujood is performed should comply with that which can be used for prostration.

_Dhikr [tasbeeh]_ should be recited in every sajdah. This should contain the remembrance of Allah, the Most High, and the Prophet (s. a. w.), as a matter of ihtiyat. The worshipper is free to recite either, "Bismillahi wa Billah, Assalamu Alai-ka Ayyuhan Nabiyu, wa Rahmatullahi wa Barakatuh" or "Bismillahi wa Billahi, wa Sallal Lahu Ala Mohammadin wa Aali Mohammad"

It is permissible insofar as the first expression is concerned to say, "Bismillahi wa Billah, wassalamu etc." Having performed them, the worshipper should recite tashahhud and tasleem.

49. When is it obligatory?
Sujood-as-sahu becomes obligatory in the situations just discussed. However, it is an independent obligation, in the sense that it is not part of prayer, nor is it complementary. Thus, prayer will not be deemed batil by deliberately leaving it out, let alone skipping it by way of an oversight.

Once it becomes obligatory, it has to be performed immediately, i.e. once prayer is over and done with, alongside any complementary precautionary ruku and qadha of any missed parts. That is, before commissioning that which would render prayer batil.

Remembering one’s slip after prayer has been done with would warrant performing sujood-as-sahu. Similarly, should the realization of the omission occur during another prayer, the worshipper can perform it after finishing the prayer.

50. Rules Governing Sujood-as-sahu

Sujood-as-sahu must be repeated whenever it is necessary to do so, although the repetition may be for the same kind of omission or commission. For example, should the worshipper recite tasleem twice where it is not called for, sujood-as-sahu must be performed twice; talking on two different occasions warrants performing sujood-as-sahu twice, irrespective of the nature of the cause for the second time round talking.

If it becomes obligatory on the worshippers to perform sujood-as-sahu more than once, should they observe the order of omissions and/or commissions?

A. Observing an order is not necessary. The mukallafs are free to start wherever they like. Indeed, it is not even obligatory to precisely designate the reason for the sujood. That is, it suffices that they perform sajdatay-as-sahu twice.
without the need for remembering the reason for performing them.

51. The worshippers may not be in a position to decide whether or not they commissioned that which warrants performing sujood-as-sahu. In this case, they should not pay attention to such a doubt. However, if the worshipper knew for sure that they are charged with the responsibility of sujood-as-sahu, but are not sure whether they discharged their responsibility, they must perform such a sujood.

The worshippers may be aware of their obligation vis-à-vis sujood-as-sahu, yet they are not quite sure whether it is for more than one occasion; they should ignore any excess. Knowledge of performing one sujood, leading to uncertainty about the second one, must warrant performing the second one, unless the worshipper has moved on to tashahhud, in which case they need not worry.

In the event of doubting the validity of performing sujood-as-sahu, the worshipper need not worry about such uncertainty.

4. Precepts Concerning Doubt During Prayer

Doubt or uncertainty in prayer can be classified into three categories:

a. Doubts regarding the performance of prayer or lack of it.
b. Doubts regarding the fulfilment of the prerequisites of prayer.

c. Doubts regarding the number of rukus.

Doubt Regarding Performance, or otherwise, of Prayer

52. When faced with such a situation, the worshipper should hasten to perform it while there is still time for doing so, thus resolving the uncertainty as though he did not perform prayer. If the uncertainty arises outside the time allotted for the disputed prayer, he should ignore such a doubt.

If the doubt centres around the performance of prayer or lack of it and whether its time is up, the worshipper must hasten to perform it. Doubt and certainty, here and in the previous assumption, are alike.

Should the day approach its end so much so that what is left of it is not sufficient for even one ruku, it should be treated as though it has come to a close. But if there was enough time for performing one to four rukus, the worshipper, who is not certain that they have said both dhuhr and asr prayers, should hasten to say asr. In case what is left of time is sufficient for five rukus, both he prayers must be said.

If, during asr prayer, the worshipper harbours a doubt about whether or not he performed dhuhr, he should conclude that he did not; in such a case, he should interrupt the prayer in hand and revert to saying dhuhr. That is, if the there is ample time for both dhuhr and asr, albeit for one ruku of the latter. Should there not be enough time for both the prayers, he must carry on with asr, thus absolving themselves of the responsibility of saying dhuhur by virtue of expiration of its time.

53. An average doubter should comply with the rules of managing doubt or uncertainty. An excessive one should not bother.

Doubts Regarding the Fulfilment of Prayer Requirements

54. Wherever and whenever the worshippers entertains a doubt about any of prayers obligations, they should resolve it by assuming that they did not perform it. The exception to this principle being the following.

55. A. Any part of prayer the performance/non-performance of which becomes the subject of doubt, after it has been overtaken by subsequent parts, even though they are mustahab such as qunoot, the doubt or uncertainty should be over-ruled.

Examples of this are uncertainty about whether the worshipper has recited takbiratul ihram while reciting al-Fatiha, or while in qunoot and doubting whether he has done the recitation, or while in ruku and doubting whether he has done the recitation, even if the doubt arises while on the way to actually bowing for ruku. In all these cases the doubt should be ignored.

Jurists call the general principle of overrunning doubt where it is too late to take remedial action as "the principle of skipping the doubt". We have already discussed many instances where this principle has been applied.

Jurists also call the other general principle of making it obligatory to take remedial action to dispel the doubt, where such action is possible because it is timely, as the "principle of doubt addressed on time and place". According to this principle the worshipper who has doubt about the propriety of any part of his prayer should take remedial action to dispel such doubt as long as he did not move on to another part of the prayer in hand.

56. b. Doubting the proper execution of any part that has already been performed, i.e. not whether or not it has actually been performed, should be ignored. This, of course, is irrespective of whether or not the doubt was discovered on the spot or after the worshipper had already moved to another part of his prayer. For example, doubting whether the worshipper recited takbiratul 'irhram properly, be it before or after embarking on recitation and so on.

This principle, the jurists term as the "principle of expiration". We have already discussed many instances where it has been called into play.

57. c. Overrunning any doubt about a breach of any of the requirements of prayer, after the worshipper has already embarked on it, especially if he knows very well that all such requirements have been fulfilled. For example, having started prayer facing the qiblah, the worshipper became doubtful whether they have moved away from it while the prayer is still in progress. Another example is that of a woman, who has started her prayer with her hair fully covered, doubting that she might have uncovered her hair at a certain stage of prayer. The ruling in both these examples is ignoring the doubt.
58. A given person might be of the type that is given to excessive doubting. The level of doubt of such a person could be reached at by what ordinary people consider as out of the ordinary. For example, should the person harbour doubt once in every three consecutive prayers or twice in every six consecutive ones, such a person should not take his doubt seriously. They should, therefore, have no alternative but to overrun any doubt about the proper execution, or lack of it, of any part of prayer he might have entertained.

However, a given worshipper may be a habitual doubter in a particular part of prayer, such as takbiratul ihram. Such a worshipper should not pay attention to the doubt insofar as that limited area is concerned. Should he become doubtful about whether or not he performed this, or the other, part of prayer, i.e., other than the particular area talked about, he shall be treated as any other average worshipper.

Occasionally, some worshippers may experience extraordinary instances of doubt as a result of certain circumstances which may give rise to great anxiety, such as bereavement, or a sense of insecurity. These worshippers must deal with their doubts in prayer in the usual manner, i.e., they cannot be treated as habitual doubters.

The worshipper may, after an increased level of instances of doubt, think that they have become habitual doubters. Such people must conclude that they have not until they are absolutely sure that they have reached that stage.

Similarly, if a person is a known habitual doubter, thinking that he may have recovered, he must maintain his original state until such a time comes that he is absolutely certain he has regained control over their level of doubt.

59. e. [In a congregational prayer], a doubt about a given part of prayer may arise, i.e. either on the part of the imam or on the part of the worshipper who is praying behind him. Such doubt could be of the type over which dispute between the two may not arise. If this occurs, the one who has reached the conclusion that he had a doubt must ignore it.

However, [in matters such as] the followers in a congregational prayer may entertain a doubt about whether or not they followed the imam in performing two sujoos. Here the knowledge of the imam that they performed the two sujoos will not be of any use to the follower, so long as they remained doubtful; indeed, they have to perform the second sujood while there is still time to do so, i.e. not having moved on to the following part.

60. If the worshipper applies the rule of ignoring the doubt, only to realize later on that his doubt was in place, what should he do?

A. Should there be time for making good the doubt, in the light of paras. (40) to (42), he should hasten to take remedial action; if it were too late, no action is required, and the prayer should count as valid. That is, unless the disputed part was rukn (fundamental part of prayer), in which case the prayer is deemed batil.

61. Upon applying the "principle of doubt addressed or time and place".
The worshippers could realize that they had already performed the doubted part. In such a case, the worshippers should carry on with their prayer, unless the disputed part was ruku, which they had performed twice or sujood which they had performed four times, in which case the prayer is deemed batil.

Doubt in the Number of Rukus

62. Any doubt that creeps in after the worshipper has finished their prayer should be ignored. However, if such a doubt arises during prayers, it could be treated in more than one way. Some doubts render prayer batil outright. Some of them will not render prayer batil, yet they call for remedial action. Some do not render prayer batil and do not require remedial action. The latter may take any of the following forms:

63. a. On performing tashahhud, or having just finished it, the worshippers may not be sure whether they have finished the second ruku, in which case this should be what is required of them at that stage of prayer, or maybe they have finished the first ruku, in which case the tashahhud they have just finished is an inadvertent one.

In such a case, the worshippers must conclude that they had performed two rukus. Thus, they must move on to perform the third ruku, should the prayer in hand consist of three rukus or four rukus. Should the prayer in hand be that of two rukus, they should finish tashahhud and perform tasleem. The prayer should, therefore, be valid.
64. b. In a four-raka prayer, the worshippers may find themselves in a position where, while sure that they got passed the second ruku, they are not sure whether the ruku in hand is the fourth one. Such a doubt must be resolved by assuming that the ruku in hand is actually the fourth one, thus finishing one's prayer with no need to worry about any remedial action.

65. c. In a three-raka prayer, the worshippers may find themselves engaged in tasleem. Yet, they are not sure whether the third ruku is over and done with. In such a case, the assumption should be that the ruku in hand is actually the third one. Consequently, the worshippers must finish tasleem and thereby prayer.

As for the doubt which does not render prayer batil, yet requires remedial action, it is confined to four-raka prayers; it could take any of the following nine forms:

66. a. After rising from the second sujood, only to become doubtful as to whether the ruku in hand was the second or third. However, they may be sure as to the second one, but not quite sure whether it was the third. The situation must be resolved in assuming that the ruku in hand is the third one. Thus, they must move on to finishing the fourth ruku including tashahhud and tasleem.

However, before embarking on anything which may detract from the validity of prayer, they must make niyyah of qurbah to perform ihtiyat prayer. After, reciting takbiratul ihram, they are required to perform one ruku from a standing position, as a matter of obligatory precaution, if their physical ability allow it. Should the physical state of the worshipper not allow for performing prayer from a standing position, they may perform one \textit{ruku} from a sitting position, also as a matter of \textit{ihtiyat}.

Thus, if the prayer where the doubt took place actually consists of four \textit{rukus}, the precautionary prayer would then be counted as supererogatory one. And if it was a three-\textit{raka} one, the precautionary prayer would count as a complementary \textit{ruku}.

67. Doubting whether the \textit{ruku} in hand was the third or fourth, irrespective of whether the doubt arises while standing, performing \textit{ruku}, performing \textit{sujood}, or rising from \textit{sujood}. This situation must be resolved by assuming that it was the fourth \textit{ruku}; thus, the worshipper can recite \textit{tashahhud} and \textit{tasleem} to bring the prayer to an end. Should the worshipper be among those who are required to say prayer from a standing position, they can choose to perform one \textit{ruku} from a standing position or two \textit{rukus} from a sitting one. If, for a good reason, the worshipper is not required to say prayer from a standing position, they can perform one \textit{ruku} from a sitting position.

This should be the case, unless doubt occurs while the worshipper is reciting \textit{tashahhud}, in which case the doubt be of the type that has been discussed in the second part of preceding para, i.e. where the prayer can be completed without the need for a remedial action.

68. c. Doubting whether the \textit{ruku} in hand was that of the second or fourth \textit{raka}, after having completed the two \textit{sujoods}, requires the worshipper to assume that it is the fourth. Upon completing prayer, they must perform two rukus from a standing position. Should the worshipper be of those with a valid reason to say prayer from a sitting position, they should perform two rukus in that position.

69. Upon performing the two sujoods, doubt may creep in as to whether the ruku in hand was the second, third, or fourth. The doubt must be resolved by assuming that the disputed ruku is the fourth one. Accordingly, the prayer must be completed thus. Remedial action should take the form of performing two rukus from a standing position followed by two rukus from a sitting position. For those worshippers with a valid reason to say prayer from a sitting position, they should perform two rukus in that position.

70. After finishing the two sujoods, doubt may arise as to whether the ruku in hand was the fourth or fifth. This should be resolved by assuming that it is the fourth; the worshippers should, therefore, complete their prayer and perform sajdatay-as-sahu.

71. While standing, the worshipper may doubt that the ruku in hand is the fourth or fifth. They should go back to a sitting position, in which case they revert to a state of doubt between the third and fourth ruku. That is, because in so doing they interrupted the fourth ruku they were in. This should mean that if it really was the fourth, the resolution of such a doubt should be by assuming that the disputed ruku is the fourth one; thus, this should lead to completing one’s prayer and performing one ruku from a standing position or two ruku from a sitting one as has already been discussed (67/b).

72. g. While standing, the worshipper may doubt that the ruku in hand is either the third or fifth. The remedial action here should be by resorting to a sitting position. In so doing the worshipper would revert the state of doubt to that between the second and fourth. Assuming that it is the fourth, he should complete prayer and perform two ruku from a standing position as has already been discussed (68/c).

73. h. While still standing, the worshippers may doubt that the ruku in hand is either the third, fourth, or fifth. Thus, they should go back to a sitting position. In so doing they would render the doubt as that between the second, third, and fourth ruku. Resolving the doubt is by assuming that the ruku is the fourth. Accordingly, he should complete his prayer and perform two ruku from a standing position followed by another two from a sitting one in line with what has already been discussed (69/d).

74. i. While still standing, the worshippers may harbour a doubt that the ruku in hand is either the fifth or sixth. They should treat such doubt as that between the fourth and fifth ruku. Thus, they should complete the prayer and perform sajdatay-as-sahu in the light of what has already been discussed (70/e).

In all these forms, the remedial action taken should render prayer valid. However, there are some exceptions:

75. a. Should the worshippers be inclined to give more preponderance to a particular raka of the disputed third, fourth, or second, they should act accordingly, in that this is no longer considered as a situation of doubt. Thus, no remedial action is called for.

If the worshipper swings between doubt and supposition (dhann), he should consider it as though it was a case of doubt and act accordingly.

76. b. The doubt of a person who is given to excessive doubting is in itself invalid and must, therefore, be ignored. Such a person must always resolve the doubt by taking to the greater number of rukus. For example, if his doubt was between the second and third ruku, he must assume that it is the third and so on. That said, he is not required to take any remedial action, unless the greater number would detract from the validity of prayer, such as doubting whether the ruku in hand was the fourth or fifth. In this case, he must assume that it is the fourth and complete the prayer; and there again he does not need to take any remedial action.

77. c. Doubt in the number of rukus in congregational prayer - the imam or congregation - can be dismissed by relying on one another. That is, should either of them was aware of the right number, be it on a level of certainty or supposition.

78. d. Should the worshippers be praying a supererogatory prayer and doubt the number of its rukus, they should suppose that they have prayed the least of the possibilities in the doubt; they may suppose that they prayed the most of the possibilities in the doubt, provided it is not of what should render prayer batil; in both cases, they can complete their prayer without the need to take any remedial action.

79. As for the third type of doubt, i.e. that which is likely to constitute a breach of prayer, it does not involve the number of rukus being performed already dealt with. Any other doubt should render prayer batil. For example, the worshipper may not be in a position to tell what number of rukus they have performed in any given prayer.

Among this type of doubt is that which involves the two-raka subh prayer and the three- ruku maghrib prayer. That is, finding oneself in either tashahhud or tasleem without being able to pinpoint the number of ruku that they could possibly have performed, as has already been discussed in paras. (63-65).

Among this too is the inability of the worshippers to determine, in a four-raka prayer, the number of ruku they may have possibly performed coupled with a lack of direction whether or not they have performed the second ruku which is completed with the lifting of the head from the second sujood or just before that. That is, doubt between the first and second or the second and third ruku cannot be sanctioned as it renders prayer invalid.

However, the worshippers could ascertain the successful completion of the second ruku if their doubt arises in any of the following possibilities:

a. Having reached certitude that they have finished and done with the second ruku after due reflection.
b. While reciting tashahhud, the worshipper may entertain doubt about whether the tashahhud is taking place after the first ruku by mistake or it is actually taking place after the second. They must resolve the situation by considering tashahhud itself an evidence that they have performed two rukus. This would be in compliance with the "principle of expiration", in that reaching a stage where they were reciting tashahhud is indicative of finishing one part of prayer and embarking on another. Thus, the second ruku could be said to have been completed as has already been discussed in para(63).

80. Doubts, which we have ruled that they constitute abreach of prayer, do not cover the four cases discussed in paras.(75-78). The ruling applicable is that we have already outlined there and then.

81. Whenever the worshippers are faced with a situation of doubt, yet they ponder it without undue haste till they reach certitude or belief about the number [of rukus], they should act accordingly; their prayer should be valid and they do not need to take any remedial action.

But having concluded that their doubt centres around a certain number, only to be thrown into a state of confusion again without being able to determine the number, they must act according to the second state of affairs. Consequently, should the doubt be of the kind which constitutes a breach of prayer, it should be deemed bati. If, however, the doubt is manageable, they should take the appropriate remedial action in the light of each of the nine cases we have already discussed.
Precautionary (ihtiyat) Prayer

82. As we have already seen that seven out of the nine cases of doubt where prayer can still be considered valid can be rectified by performing precautionary prayer.

When is it obligatory?

Precautionary prayer in those seven cases is obligatory. That is, it is not permissible for the mukallaifs, who is faced with a situation of doubt, to interrupt the prayer and start again, as a matter of obligatory precaution. They should, therefore, make good the doubt by performing precautionary prayer.

83. Precautionary prayer can no longer be obligatory, if, upon completing their prayer, the worshippers reached a conclusion that they were right in assuming the most possible number of rukus and that their prayer is in order. Should they reach that conclusion while they are still performing precautionary prayer, they can interrupt it or complete it as a supererogatory two-raka prayer.

After the prayer is over and done with, there may arise a situation, where the worshippers may reach a conclusion that their prayer was incomplete. For instance, after having doubted whether they had performed three or four rukus and having settled for four and completed the prayer thus. Now, having reconsidered that matter, they became sure that they had performed three rukus only. In such a case, can precautionary prayer be waived?

In answering this question, one should discuss the following cases:

a. Should the shortfall be discovered just before embarking on the precautionary prayer, they should ignore the ta-shahhud and tasleem they have recited and go back to a standing position to complete the prayer by performing the fourth ruku. However, although they are not required to recite takbiratul ihram, yet they should recite, in that ruku, what a worshipper usually recites.

b. The shortfall may be discovered during the performance of the precautionary prayer from a standing position. If the worshipper is still reciting, i.e. before actually bowing down for ruku, he should continue it with the intention of making up for the shortfall. If discovering the mistake occurs after ruku have been performed, prayer has to be resumed afresh, as a matter of obligatory precaution.

c. Should the mistake be discovered after the worshipper has embarked on precautionary prayer from a sitting position, he should interrupt it and stand up to perform the fourth ruku of their prayer. Again this should be done without takbiratul ihram, but with the usual recitation during the last ruku.

d. Should the mistake be discovered after the worshipper has bowed for ruku in the precautionary prayer from a sitting position, it is desirable, as a matter of obligatory precaution, to start the prayer again.

If the mistake is discovered after the completion of precautionary prayer, the worshipper is not required to do anything else.

85. Suppose that the worshipper recited tasleem, thus bringing their prayer to a close. Before doing anything that could invalidate prayer, he became doubtful whether he settled for the fourth ruku believing it was the last one, or his doubt was swinging between the third and fourth, thus settling for the fourth so that he could perform precautionary prayer as a remedy. Does precautionary prayer become obligatory in such a case?

A. Apparently, it is not obligatory and nothing shall be required of him.

85. Suppose a worshipper became liable to perform precautionary prayer. He entertained doubt as to whether or not he performed it. Is it obligatory on him to perform it?

A. If the doubt occurred after the prayer time has elapsed, or on completing it, they did that which invalidates prayer, they are not required to perform precautionary prayer. Otherwise, they should discharge their responsibility by performing it.

86. How should it be performed?

We have already mentioned that precautionary prayer could take different forms. It could consist of either one ruku from a standing position or one ruku from a sitting position. It could consist of two ruku from a standing position or two from a sitting one. Its general form is that of any prayer consisting of one or two ruku.

All those parts and conditions which are obligatory in an obligatory daily prayer should also be fulfilled in a precautionary one. That is, except for the surah and the recitation of al-Fatiha audibly; the worshipper is required to observe inaudible recitation throughout.

Should the worshipper do that which invalidates prayer, before embarking on precautionary prayer, his prayer is rendered batil as though the action they commissioned would have occurred in his original prayer. In such a case, he must repeat the prayer.

87. Lapses and Doubts

Any omission or commission in precautionary prayer whether inadvertently, out of ignorance, or deliberately, is treated in the same way as though it took place in any obligatory daily prayer.

Whenever the rules call for the invalidation of precautionary prayer, the worshipper should say the original prayer again.

The same rules that deal with doubt in the obligatory daily prayer apply in any obligatory utterance or action of precautionary prayer. For example, if the doubt occurs after the worshipper had moved on to a new part of the prayer, no remedial action is required; should it take place before, a repeat is called for.

Should the worshippers become uncertain as to the number of rukus in a two-raka precautionary prayer, they should settle for the higher number, unless the latter constitutes a breach of the prayer. For example, if the doubt was between two and three rukus, the worshippers should aim for the lesser number possible so that their prayer be in order.

5. Congregational Prayer

88. Congregational prayer is among the most important devotional practices of Islam. Tradition has it that it is highly mustahab, being a self-evident truth in Islam. Allah, the Exalted, promised those who take to it a great reward; such reward could outweigh the reward of many obligatory devotions and most of the mustahab ones. The bigger the congregation, which serves as an indicator of Muslim solidarity, the loftier its place and the bigger the reward for the worshippers.

Congregational prayer is best manifested in the obligatory daily prayers, performed on time, especially subh, maghrib and isha, and those prayers whose time has elapsed, i.e. qadha.

89. Congregational prayer may become wajib in given situations:

a. When time is pressing and the worshippers are afflicted with a speech impediment, such as stammer. Such people are obligated to pray behind an imam, in which case they would be relieved of reciting the surah. This is particularly so when time is so short that there may be time left for only one ruku.

b. The mukallafs may be a complete novice who is in need of learning how to recite. Having delayed the learning process till late, it is rather impossible for them to say their prayer independently. Thus, it is obligatory on them to perform their prayer as a part of a congregation; the imam of prayer will take the burden of recitation away from them.

c. The mukallaf may be nadhr bound, or may have made a vow or an oath, to say congregational prayer. It is obligatory on them to do so to honour such a commitment.
Praying Independently or Behind an Imam

90. Prayer may take two forms: The worshippers could say their prayer alone, i.e. without any lawful relationship with another worshipper. This is called individual prayer. We have already discussed both the form and the content of this prayer.

The worshippers may choose to say their prayer behind another worshipper as an imam (leader). Having chosen to do so, the one who follows in prayer has to mimic the manner and expression of the imam. This prayer is called congregational prayer. The act of mimicking is an expression of the lawful (shari'iah). The relationship between the two. The imam and the worshipper.

Both prayers, i.e. that of the imam and the one following him in prayer, are more superior than an individual prayer because both parties are involved in performing congregational prayer which is highly recommended.

The following points are precursors to the rules concerning congregational prayer.

1. When is it permissible to take part in a congregational prayer?
2. The manner it is conducted in.
3. Rules governing it.
4. Differences of the manner of both congregational and individual prayers is conducted in.
5. Rules regulating congregational prayer.
When is it permissible to take part in a congregational prayer?

91. It is permissible to take part in congregational prayer for obligatory daily prayers, Juma prayer, Ayat prayer and others. However, Tawaf obligatory prayer is an exception, because we do not have any evidence that conducting it in a congregation is permissible.

It is not permissible to hold congregational prayer of the mustahab type, even if it becomes thus by way of nadhr. This covers daily supererogatory prayers and other prayers. However, Istisqa (rainfall), the two eid prayers can be held in a congregation, although they are mustahab (voluntary).

92. Holding congregational prayer is not obligatory in all the obligatory prayers, save Juma and Eid prayers, in that the latter shall not be in order unless they are held in a congregation.

93. Should the worshipper say the obligatory daily prayer by themselves, it would do. However, it is mustahab for the worshipper to repeat it as part of a congregation, whether as imam or following in prayer. That is, provided there are at least two participants, one of whom should be performing it afresh.

In case the worshipper performed the obligatory prayer once individually and a second time congregationally, only to find out that the one he performed individually was batil, the second one should serve as a substitute.

94. Suppose the two prayers being performed by both the imam and the one following him in prayer were among the obligatory prayers where congregational prayer is sanctioned. Is it necessary that both prayers be the same; e.g. subh or ayat, or would it still be permissible to take part in such a congregation and the prayer still stands, although that of the imam is different from that of the one following him in prayer?

A. It is permissible to join in such a congregation, although the two prayers (those of the imam and the one following him in prayer) are asymmetrical. For example, you can join in a congregation with the intention of praying maghrib whereas the imam is praying isha; an imam who is performing a current prayer and a follower who is performing qadha prayer for yesterday and vice versa, tamam and qasr and so on, i.e. this is applicable to any obligatory prayer being performed either by the imam or the follower.

95. The exception of the permissibility of joining in an asymmetrical prayer is when the imam is leading either eid and ayat prayers, or that which performed for a dead person. In such a case the worshipper cannot join in except with the intention of performing the kind of prayer the imam is leading.

The same applies for istisqa prayer for both the imam and the one following him in prayer.

96. Suppose a worshipper wants to perform any obligatory daily prayers that he suspects he has missed. Thus, he is resolved to say them by way of ihtiyat. Can he say them behind an imam who is leading an obligatory daily prayer? Is it permissible for other worshippers performing obligatory prayers to follow him? And is it permissible for other worshippers in the same situation of his to follow them in prayer?

A. This worshipper can join in a congregation being held for an obligatory daily prayer. However, it is not permissible for other worshippers to follow him in prayer, if it was an obligatory daily one.

It is permissible for other worshippers wanting to perform ihtiyat prayers to follow in prayer an imam who is praying a symmetrical prayer, irrespective of the nature of ihtiyat being adopted by either worshipper. An example of this could be that the imams reason for ihtiyat is uncertainty about the taharah of his clothes, whereas the followers ihtiyat is combining qasr and tamam prayers.

97. Suppose a worshipper was praying a one-ruku precautionary prayer as a remedy for a suspected lapse in their prayer. Is it permissible for them to follow in prayer an imam who is leading an obligatory daily prayer, or another one who is in the same situation of his? And is it permissible for a worshipper, who is performing an obligatory daily prayer, to follow him in prayer?

A. It is not permissible [on the three counts].

However, you may pose another hypothesis, i.e. that of two worshippers who are engaged in a congregational prayer for the obligatory daily ones.

Both reached the same conclusion as to the number of rukus they suspect have performed. Suppose it was between three and four rukus; accordingly, they settled for the greater number; having completed their prayer thus, they turned to praying a one-ruku prayer. Should the one following in prayer carry on praying behind the imam?

A. The permissibility of following in prayer in such a case is possible. However, it, as a matter of obligatory precaution, is desirable for the worshipper not to pray behind the imam. This is because the precautionary ruku is considered a mustahab kind of devotion, if the original prayer was to be complete. Thus, following in a prayer of the mustahab type is not allowed.

98. You may be about to say one of your obligatory daily prayers. You may find a worshipper, who can fulfill the requirements of imam, engaged in prayer. You should not join in prayer behind him, unless you are sure that the prayer he is performing is an obligatory one and that it is permissible to do so. This is because he could be engaged in a supererogatory prayer, or performing an obligatory one of the type which cannot be held congregationally, such as tawaf prayer by way of qadha.

How should one go about joining in congregational prayer?

99. Following in prayer means that, upon reciting takbiratul ihram, you hold niyyah that you are performing prayer by way of following another worshipper, who becomes an imam by virtue of your following him. This is irrespective of whether or not the imam has the intention of assuming such a role. That is, the congregation is established as a result of the niyyah of the follower, not the imam.
That said, in prayers that have to be said in congregation, the imams have to be aware that they are conducting same as imam. An example of this is Juma prayer and any other obligatory daily prayer voluntarily performed as a repeat while leading the prayer.

The ones who are following in prayer have to identify the person whom they are following. Thus, it is not permissible for them to pray behind two persons at the same time, nor is it permissible to pray behind someone at random.

However, it is not necessary that you name the imam. A reference in one’s mind would do. That is, after making sure that the imam fulfills the requirements. Such requirements will be elaborated later.

Having joined in prayer behind someone believing him to be Mr. (x), only to find out that he was Mr. (y), the prayer stands, if the latter is qualified to be imam.

It is not permissible for any two persons to hold, at any one time, niyyah to pray behind the other. Neither is it permissible for a person to hold niyyah to pray behind someone who is in turn holding niyyah to pray behind a third party.

It is not permissible for a worshipper, who inaugurated his prayer independently, to switch niyyah to that of one following in prayer. It is permissible though to do that at the start of prayer.

100. It is not necessary that the worshipper starts his prayer at the same time as that of the imam. It is important though that the one who is following in prayer should not precede the imam in reciting takbiratul ihram.
The worshipper is free to join in congregational prayer at any stage of the first ruku, including while the imam is actually in ruku. All what they need to do is stand upright, hold niyyah for praying in congregation, recite takbiratul ihram, then bow down for ruku, provided that the imam is still in a state of ruku.

The worshipper is also allowed to join in while congregational prayer is still in progress at any stage, be it in the second ruku or any other ruku as will be discussed in some detail.

Q. Is it permissible for the worshippers to make niyyah with the intention of praying behind the imam in part of their prayer, e.g. one or two rukus only?

A. When the total number of rukus of the prayer of the worshipper draws to a close, they are free to break off from the congregation. An example of this is someone performing maghrib prayer behind another who is praying dhuhr qadha. The one who is following in prayer should be able to finish the number of rukus they are required to perform, i.e. three. There and then they are free to depart, leaving the imam to perform the fourth ruku of the prayer he is saying.

Should the imam finish his prayer before that of the person following him in prayer, the latter is allowed to carry on with their prayer and finish it independently. An example of this is a worshipper joining in the congregation during the second ruku of dhuhr prayer. The imam would naturally finish before the one following him in prayer, leaving the latter finish his independently.

If both the imam and the person following him in prayer have something in hand to be over and done with, it is advisable for the follower, on the basis of voluntary precaution, to stick by the congregation to preserve its image and reap the reward (thawab).

The exception is that of the person following in prayer who go their own way when both sit for tashahhud and tasleem. They are free to step the pace up to finish the prayer before the imam.

101. Should the person who is following another in prayer go solo contrary to what we have just discussed, there may arise two possibilities:

a. The notion of going solo must have crossed their mind under the spur of the moment, i.e. they did not think of it at the start of prayer. Their prayer is in order. The recitation should be valid too, if the idea of going solo occurred before performing the first or the second ruku, i.e. the recitation of the imam would be taken into consideration as though he did it on their behalf. Consequently, they are not required to repeat anything. If before going solo, the worshipper had to introduce an extra rukn in prayer, for the sake of keeping pace with the imam, it would not detract from prayer, although it should, as a matter of optional ihtiyat, be considered batil, in which case it has to be repeated.

In all the cases of the worshipper deciding to go solo after joining the congregation, it is not permissible for them to rescind their decision.

b. Suppose the person following in prayer was intent at the outset to switch from following the imam to going solo, say, at the stage of qunoot. Is such a prayer valid?

A. Yes, it is permissible to do so, although it is advised not to countenance it.

It is not permissible for the worshipper in a congregational prayer to jockey from one congregation to another in any one prayer.

102. Niyyah of qurbah is one of the prerequisites for the validity of prayer. However, it is not thus insofar as the validity of congregational prayer is concerned. That is, if the worshipper joins in a congregational prayer with the intention of improving their recitation, or guarding against falling prey to Satan's suggestions, or showing solidarity with the imam, who is of an impeccable character, or glorifying the faith, such prayer is valid. The worshippers reward for that shall be commensurate with their intention, i.e. no reward for the congregational prayer shall be reaped.

He who joins in a congregational prayer just to show off shall be deemed guilty and his prayer batil, because hypocrisy invalidates any act of worship. The same goes for the imam. In his case, he should be doubly alert not to fall into such pitfalls; he should preserve his niyyah from devilish insinuations.

103. Someone may find himself amidst a congregation. They are not quite sure whether he is praying by himself or being part of the congregation. He should resolve the matter by settling for a solo prayer. The mere suggestion that he may be part of a congregation is immaterial.

Once behind an imam, the worshipper swung between abandoning the idea of praying as part of the congregation or sticking by it. He must abide by their original intention.

Stipulations of Praying in Congregation

Neither following in prayer nor congregational prayer itself can be sanctioned unless the following conditions are fulfilled:

The First Condition Concerning Praying in Congregation

104. a. The worshipper can join in congregational prayer either while the imam reciting takbiratul ihram, standing upright and reciting, after the recitation but before bowing down for ruku, or during ruku but before rising to a standing position. All this can be done in the first ruku and in the other rukus for that matter. However, it is not permissible to join in the prayer at the point when the imam is actually rising from ruku, or on his way to perform sujood. The worshipper wishing to join in should wait until the imam has actually risen to a new ruku.

105. The exception to this is when the worshipper arrives late for congregational prayer, i.e. while the imam is reciting the last tashahhud. Here, should the worshipper be eager to reap the reward of congregational prayer, they can recite takbiratul ihram with the intention of praying in congregation; he should immediately proceed to a sitting position to join in reciting tashahhud. Once the imam finished tashahhud and started tasleem the worshipper can rise to resume his prayer solo without the need for a new takbiratul ihram.
This procedure can be embarked on, if the imam was performing either the first or the second sujood of the last ruku, by simply reciting takbiratul ihram, performing both or either sujood, as the case maybe until the end of tashahhud.

In so doing, the worshipper would be entitled to the reward of congregational prayer, yet what he has done is an extra devotion that would not count towards the prayer in hand. What would though, is joining in [at any stage] before the imam has risen from ruku.

106. Should the worshipper achieve the bare minimum of ruku which coincided with the imam actually rising from ruku, we cannot unequivocally say that the following [in prayer] is valid. However, if the worshipper did so in the belief that he would be able to attain the ruku while the imam is still in ruku, only to find out that it was not the case, his prayer is valid as a solo one.

If the same situation occurs, but this time the worshipper is uncertain whether the imam was actually still in ruku or on his way up, having completed it, his prayer is valid as a congregational one.

107. Having arrived at the scene while the imam is in ruku, the worshipper was reluctant to take any course of action. He can make niyyah, recite takbiratul ihram and perform ruku. If he managed to keep up with the imam while in ruku, his prayer would count as a congregational one; conversely, it would count as a solo one.

108. Should the worshippers fear they may join in good time for ruku, if they were to get to the ranks of worshippers, they can recite takbiratul ihram, perform ruku, and walk, while in ruku, to get to the nearest line, provided that they maintain their position in relation to the direction of qiblah and that they should not do that which could detract from any part of congregational prayer.

109. In all the cases where the worshippers arrive late to join a congregational prayer with the intention of catching up with the imam before the latter rises from any ruku, and fail to do that, it will be too late to make good that raka. The alternative is either to go solo or switch to a supererogatory prayer; if the latter be their choice, the worshipper is free to complete it or interrupt it to join in the congregation when the imam resumes a new ruku.

The Second Condition

b. Keeping up with the imams in all what they are doing or reciting, be it ruku, sujood, qiyam, sitting, recitation, dhikr, tashahhud etc. That is, you should not perform any of the obligations of prayer, be it rukn (fundamental part) or otherwise, before the imam has done so. Your following the imam should be such that you should not leave a long pause between you and him; you can also carry out all that he does simultaneously.

However, carrying out utterances - apart from takbiratul ihram - simultaneously is not obligatory, in that reciting takbiratul ihram by the person who is doing the following should be done only after the imam has done so. It is permissible for members of the congregation to precede the imam in the recitation of Basmalah, tashahhud, dhikr etc. Members of the congregation can also increase the number of tasbihs during ruku, to, say, seven times, in case the imam confined them to three times.

111. Should the one following in prayer deliberately abandon the following, his action is deemed batil and consequently he can no longer be deemed part of the congregation, irrespective of whether or not he was aware that such an obligation was a condition to congregational prayer.

However, doing so due to an oversight can be tolerated. The remedial action that can be taken by such a person is that he should wait to see if they can avail himself of the opportunity of joining in the congregational prayer; this though can be espoused in certain instances that will be discussed later. Failure to do so would not subject the worshipper to any penalty. This can be illustrated by the following hypotheses:

112. The follower in prayer inadvertently rising from ruku before the imam. If, on realizing one's mistake, one immediately goes back to ruku while the imam is still in ruku, he should take no further action.

However, if upon realizing one's mistake one does not hasten to resume ruku with the imam, one should switch to a solo prayer because he can no longer be party to the congregational prayer.

113. Inadvertently lifting one's head from the sujood spot prematurely, i.e. before the imam, is treated in the same way discussed in the preceding para. That is to say, the extra ruku or sujood thus performed can be tolerated for the purpose of keeping pace with the imam.

114. Should the follower in prayer rise prematurely and inadvertently from either ruku or sujood, only to find out that the imam has already done so, he should continue his prayer with the imam and not worry about anything else.

115. There is the case of the follower, in prayer, who does actually perform either ruku or sujood prematurely as a result of an oversight while the imam is still in ruku or sujood. The worshipper should recite dhikr in both cases and resume the following of the imam by performing the ruku or sujood, as case maybe, for a second time, but this time round with the imam. However, in the repeated ruku or sujood, he does not have to recite dhikr.

Should this happen at the point of the imams bowing down for either ruku or sujood, they should stay put and continue his prayer with the imam.

116. If the follower becomes out of step with the imam in performing simultaneous ruku or sujood due to absent-mindedness until the imam has risen from either ruku or sujood, he should perform the part he missed and continue following the imam. He need not worry about anything else.

117. Both the imam and the one following him in prayer may rise from either ruku or sujood at the same time; the followers could find themselves unintentionally resuming an upright standing or a sitting one before the imam. They should stay put until the imam assumes the same position and continue their prayer thereafter.

118. Should the imam inadvertently perform an extra sujood, it is not obligatory on the person following him to do likewise. Non-adherence to the principle of following the imam should, in this situation, not detract from the following itself and the congregation.

119. The followers may lift their head from sujood, only to find out that the imam is still in sujood. Believing that this was the first of the two sujoods, they resumed sujood in compliance with the principle of following the imam as is discussed in para. (113); however, it transpired that sujood was the second; the worshippers' sujood would count as a second one.

120. Should the worshippers presume that it was the second sujood, and perform a second one in that belief, only to find out that it was the first, it would count as such, i.e. the first pursuant to that of the imam.

The Third Condition

121. c. The presence of both the imam and the congregation, right from the inception of the assembly to the end, in one place, so much so that, according to the established practice, they cannot but be called as a gathering for prayer as a unit, i.e. not dispersed. Large numbers of lines of worshippers praying behind the imam is immaterial so long as the definition of a "gathering" fits.

Thus, it is not permissible for a worshipper to pray, from a place inside their house, behind an imam in a mosque, for this is not a gathering as such. Accordingly the prayer cannot be sanctioned as a congregational one.

On this premise, congregational prayer cannot be deemed valid with the existence of a wall, or any other barrier, between the imam and those following him in prayer, or between the lines of worshippers which may render the gathering not a fully-fledged one. Similarly, the congregation ceases to be called as such, if there were gaps between the imam and members of the congregation or between their ranks.

It is desirable, as a matter of obligatory precaution, for each and every member of congregation to have a gap, not wider than an ordinary step of a man, between themselves and the imam or the worshipper standing in front of them. When it comes to what can constitute a barrier, it is also desirable to avoid anything that may prevent seeing or watching, such as wall or the like.

122. The exception to the rule are women standing in prayer behind an imam among men and/or formations of men in congregation. They are allowed to screen themselves from men. A wider gap between the place the woman is standing in and the imam, or the rest of congregation, is also allowed.

123. It is permissible to hold congregational prayer despite the existence of transparent barriers, such as glass or mesh screens. Such obstacles should not detract from the validity of the assembly. Congregational prayer is also permissible with the presence of a movable object, such as a human being passing by.
124. It is sufficient for the validity of the congregation that at least one worshipper in the line of worshippers maintains the right gap between themselves and the worshipper standing in front of them. Thus, their prayer as well as that of the one standing to their right and left shall be valid, even with the presence of a wall or any other barrier; in such a case the gathering should be deemed proper.

According to this premise, if the mosque overflows with worshippers, one of them could stand at the threshold of its open gate, occupying such a vantage point that they could see the imam directly through him who could see the imam [third party]. The prayer of this worshipper prayer is valid, so is the prayer of all those who are standing to their right and left, or behind them.

125. As those worshippers who are standing in the front lines in the congregation can constitute neither a gap nor an barrier between the imam and those standing behind them, they cannot constitute any screen when they are about to embark on takbiratul ihram. Thus, it is permissible for those occupying the back lines to make niyyah for congregational prayer followed by takbiratul ihram, should they notice that their fellow worshippers are ready to do so, such as having raised their hands in preparation to reciting takbiratul ihram. Should a situation arise where any of the worshippers occupying the front rows is engaged in performing a qasr prayer, this would not detract from the prayer of the worshipper standing behind them. If the first one decides to leave the congregation after they finish their prayer, the one who is standing behind them can hasten to move forward to close the gap, should it grow wider than be necessary. That is, provided that the worshippers maintained their position in relation to the direction of qiblah.

The same applies to the fellow worshipper standing to the side of the worshipper who was performing qasr prayer.

126. Q. Suppose a worshipper taking part in a congregation prayer is aware that the prayer of some of those occupying the rows in front of him is batil. Would their presence constitute any barrier or gap?

A. No, neither a barrier nor a gap is thus constituted so long as the form and content of prayer are preserved. Accordingly, the person who is praying in the ranks behind them can rest assured that their prayer is valid.

127. A congregational prayer convened without the presence of a barrier which may detract from its being called as such. Shortly afterwards, it transpired to one member of the congregation that there appeared to be a gap or a barrier. What is the ruling?

A. The ruling is that one should assume that the congregation is intact and therefore valid. However, if at the outset one is doubtful about the presence of a gap or a barrier, which would, according to established practice, be seen as belittling its stature, it is not permissible for the doubting person to rely on such congregation, let alone take part in it.

Ignorance of the existence of a gap or an obstacle, which would detract from the congregation being dubbed thus, is not an admissible excuse for the validity of prayer. Whoever faces such a situation, his following in prayer of such a congregation is batil outright. His prayer should be judged in the light of the ruling which will be discussed in para(140).

The Fourth Condition

d. The imam should meet certain requirements, some of which concern his character in general, and others relate to his particular position in the prayer he is leading.

128. a. The imam of the congregation should be sound in mind, adult, as a matter of ihtiyat, legitimate by birth, a believer, and even-handed; the imam should also be male, if the one following him was male; women cannot lead men in prayer; they can, however, lead other women in prayer. The imam should not be Aarabi, i.e. a person who take for domicile a place that may invite sneering - which could in turn inspire suspicion about their adherence to sharia laws.

b. As for the requirements of the imam’s position as the leader of prayer, the following must be met:

129. a. The imam must be well versed in recitation, for the one following in prayer would rely on him in this regard, as will be elaborated.

130. b. The imam must perform his prayer from a standing position, if the person following him do likewise. A follower, who is praying from a sitting position, can pray behind an imam who is in the same situation.

131. c. The prayer of the imam should be valid would in the view of the one following him in prayer, so that the following [in prayer] can be sanctioned. For example, the follower may know, although not for a fact, that the water the imam used for wudhu was najis; so, should the imam start praying, it is not permissible for the person with knowledge about the najasah of water to pray behind him.

However, if the follower is not quite sure whether the imam performed wudhu using that najis water or another source of water, they must resolve such doubt by assuming that the imam’s prayer is valid. They can, therefore, take him for an imam in prayer.

Both the imam and the follower might diverge about certain details of parts of prayer, as a matter of personal opinion (ijtihad) or as a result of their following, by way of taqleed, two different jurists. How can the person following in prayer resolve the situation?

A. Should the difference be of the type that if the ignorants (al jahil) were to commission, they would not be made to bear the consequences, and thus their prayer valid, there is no harm in praying behind the imam.

For example, the imam may be of the opinion that reciting tasbih [dhikr] once in the third and fourth ruku; the persons who are praying behind him see it differently, i.e. according to them it is obligatory to recite it three times. Here, the imam is excused for reciting it once and the follower a therefore allowed to pray behind him.

Should the point of difference be of the type that the ignorants are not excused if they were to commission it and find out about their mistake later, the ones intending to pray behind the imam are not allowed to go ahead with their plan, should they be certain, and even if they have the slightest doubt, that the imam would naturally adopt the opposite opinion regarding the disputed point.

For example, the person intending to pray behind a given imam knows very well that the imam can tolerate performing wudhu with rose water; they would not. Therefore, since wudhu is a point for which the ignorant would not be forgiven if he made a lapse, it is not permissible for the follower to take for imam a person, unless they are absolutely sure that he did not perform his wudhu in the manner they view batil.

132. d. Should the surface of the area taken for prayer be conspicuously uneven, the imam's position should not be higher than that of the person following them in prayer by a measure of shibr (circa 32cm). or more.

For example, the place of prayer could extend to cover a room and a courtyard. Suppose the imam were to stand in the room, whose surface is elevated, and the worshipper/s following him in prayer were to stand in the court. If the level of the raised section was more than 23 cm., it is not permissible for the imam to take his position there, and the congregation in the courtyard. However, it is permissible if the two positions were reversed.

If the unevenness of the surface is not that noticeable, such as in the case of a graded one, the imam can take stand in any position of that stretch of land.

133. Generally speaking, the jurists maintain that male imams take an advanced position over the worshipper following them in prayer. However, it is more likely (al-aqwa) that it is permissible to juxtapose their two positions. That is, it is not obligatory that the followers position be slightly or completely behind that of the imam.

That said, it is advisable not to ignore the opinion that espouses standing behind the imam on ihtiyat basis. Furthermore, in case the congregation consists of two men, the one who is following in prayer should stand on the right hand side slightly behind the imam in a measure that would result in making the sujood spot of the follower on a par with spot where the imam places his knees.

Accordingly, the position of the one following in prayer must not be ahead of that of the imam.

Since this is the case, the one doing the following must not be ahead of the imam in all such instances as ruku, sitting, and sujood.

How is congregational prayer conducted?

134. We have already discussed the manner in which solo, or independent, prayer is conducted. The prayer of the imam of a congregation is exactly the same as that prayed independently by any worshipper, except for niyyah, i.e. the imam should make niyyah that he is praying as imam.

That said, both end up with some different rules to cope with, not pertaining to the content of prayer, rather to the consequential actions to take remedial action to right a lapse.

For example, if the worshipper who is praying alone harbours a doubt about the real number of rukus of any prayer, such as that between three and four, they should settle for the greater number. The imam of a congregational prayer should rely on any member of the congregation who are known for their reliability.

The prayer of a member of a congregation is slightly different from that of an individual praying alone, both in manner and rules regulating it.

As you may know, we have already mentioned that the worshipper can pray behind an imam by joining in the congregation at any raka of the prayer, provided that they be able to catch up with the imam as he is standing before actually bowing down for ruku or while he is performing it, but before rising.

Now, we are going to discuss the manner in which the worshipper should conduct their prayer if they have joined in during the first ruku. We will then discuss the manner of prayer, if joining in the congregation took place during the second ruku and thereafter.

135. When the worshippers join in the congregation by making niyyah and reciting takbiratul ihram either simultaneously with or after the imam, they do not have to recite, because they are absolved of such a responsibility. As a matter of obligatory precaution, dhikr should be left to the imam too.

However, you may ask whether it is permissible for the member of congregation to recite if they so wish; the answer is:

A great deal depends on whether or not the imam’s recitation can be heard by the member of congregation in any prayer where reciting audibly is the norm, such as maghrib, isha and subh. Should the worshipper be in a position to hear the imam, be it clearly or otherwise, they are advised not to recite. Conversely, it is permissible for them to do so. This is regardless of the worshippers objective behind the recitation, i.e. whether they mean it as part of the prayer or simply a usual recitation in the Holy Quran. However, the worshipper is better advised to recite inaudibly, yet listening is even more superior.

In a prayer where reciting inaudibly is the norm, it is obligatory on the worshippers to refrain from reciting; they may, though, resort to reciting tasbih or chanting the praise of Allah (tahmid) instead.

When the imam bows down for ruku, the follower should do the same. When the imam rises for a second ruku, the worshipper should follow suit; insofar as recitation and other matters are concerned, the remarks of the preceding paragraph should be noted.

Thus, the followers should take it upon themselves to perform all parts of prayer, and not rely on the imam except in the recitation of suratul-Fatiha and the second surah in both the first and second ruku. Upon getting as far as the third ruku, the follower could choose between reciting tasbih or surah al-Fatiha as is the case in holding a solo prayer.

The followers may join in prayer, while the imam is reciting, and inadvertently stay silent until after the imam has performed ruku and risen from it. No harm is done; the follower can still perform ruku and follow through.

The followers could recite takbiratul ihram, only to see the imam immediately bowing down for ruku. They should immediately follow suit. The same should be done when they join in while the imam is still in ruku, because recitation is the imam’s responsibility.

136. Should the followers join in prayer while the imam is either standing or actually in the second ruku, they can recite takbiratul ihram and follow suit. They are therefor absolved of the responsibility of recitation. The remaining points discussed in the preceding paragraph apply. However, this ruku of the worshipper counts as the first one as opposed to its being the second one performed by the imam.

If joining in the congregation takes place just before the imam embarks on qunoot, it is mustahab for the worshippers to join him. After the imam rises from sujood to recite tasbih, the worshippers are not required to do so, as it this is their first ruku; however, it is mustahab for them to assume a sitting position as though they are about to stand up and follow it through.

When the imam stands up to perform the third ruku, the followers should stand up for their second ruku. At this stage, it is obligatory on them to recite suratul-Fatiha and the second surah, for the imam’s recitation in the first two rukus can compensate for the follower’s recitation.

It is necessary for the follower to refrain from reciting audibly, even if reciting audibly is allowed for the prayer being performed. Where the followers are worried about the possibility of not keeping pace with the imam, before they finish reciting the second surah, they are free to leave it out and follow the imam in his ruku.

Should the followers be faced with the possibility of not being able to follow the imam out in his ruku, while they are still reciting al-Fatiha, they are not allowed to interrupt their recitation. They have to finish reciting it in the hope that they would be able to catch up with the imam. Failing that, they have to go solo in their prayer. Thus, they have to finish the reciting al-Fatiha and the second surah.

137. The followers may arrive late for the congregational prayer, making their debut in the third ruku. There may be two possibilities:

a. They may be in a position to join in the congregation while the imam is still standing. They should, therefore, recite suratul-Fatiha inaudibly, and the second surah where possible; if not, reciting al-Fatiha alone would do, should they be mindful of becoming out of kilter with imam.

b. Joining in while the imam is still in ruku would necessitate that the worshipper immediately assumes a ruku position following in the footsteps of the imam. Thus, they are relieved of the obligation of recitation.

In both cases, the worshippers must maintain inaudible recitation and can perform qunoot, if there is room for that. When the imam reaches the point where they embark on reciting tashahhud and tasleem in the last ruku, the followers should do likewise insofar as tashahhud is concerned, which will be their first, i.e. after their second ruku, and then go it alone to finish their prayer.

138. On arriving at a congregation, while the imam is still standing, the worshippers did not know what stage of prayer the congregation has reached, i.e. it could by any of the four rukus. Thus, it is permissible for them to inaudibly recite al-Fatiha and the second surah. Should they discover that the imam was in their third or fourth ruku, the action they had taken would be deemed sound and with it their prayer. If it was the first or second ruku, no harm should have been done, i.e. the prayer still stands.

Rules Concerning Matters Arising from Congregational Prayer

139. We shall discuss below the rules that distinguish congregational prayer from a solo one.

Both the imam and the one following him in prayer are jointly responsible for any lapse concerning the exact number of rukus being performed. Any one of them who is confident that they are aware of the right number must be followed. This of course is contrary to the worshipper who is praying solo, where if faced with the same situation, they have to settle for the greater number of the disputed number of rukus.

As we already know (para. 113), the extra sujoold or ruku performed by the member of congregation can be tolerated, when it is done for the sake of following the imam through. This, though, is not allowed when you are holding prayer by yourself.

When the worshipper, who is praying solo, is intent on performing an extra sujoold, although he knows this goes against the grain and the spirit of the laws, such action is bound to lead to invalidating his prayer.

In case the worshipper, either inadvertently or through ignorance, performed an extra ruku or extra two sujoolds, his prayer would be deemed null and void. Both the imam and the one following him in prayer are treated in the same way in this regard.

140. If after taking part in congregational prayer, the worshipper discovers that such partaking was, for any reason, not valid, his prayer should still count. He is, therefore, not required to take further action, unless he was involved, for the sake of keeping pace with imam, in performing an extra raka or extra two sujoods in one ruku; this would require him to repeat his prayer. The same applies in the case of the worshippers doubt about the number of rukus. Should the worshipper rely on the imam’s decision in that regard, only to find out that they were in the right and the imam in the wrong, they have to repeat their prayer.

[An examples of] "deeming the prayer valid" could be that of a person praying behind another trusting in his rectitude and devoutness, only to find out that the imam was not worthy of the trust, for either being a wayward person, an unbeliever, not versed in proper recitation, or simply his prayer was found to be lacking. Another example is that of a person discovering that the congregation he took part in fell short of any of the requirements which make following in prayer a valid one.

6. Differences Between an Obligatory Daily Prayer and a Supererogatory One

141. As you may be aware, we have already discussed some differences between obligatory daily prayers and supererogatory ones. Here is a summary of the differences in rulings pertaining to these prayers:

a. It is obligatory on the worshipper to maintain a steady and repose state while performing the obligatory daily prayers; this is in contrast to supererogatory ones, where the mukallaf can perform them while walking or being aboard a moving vehicle, etc.

b. The worshipper, who is performing an obligatory daily prayer, is required to physically perform ruku and sujoood; it will not suffice, if he were to point to ruku or sujoood by any movement of their body, accentuating the nodding, for example, for sujoood more than that made for ruku. That is, if they are performing it while in motion.

But, should he choose to perform it while standing still, it will not be accepted as proper, unless both ruku and sujoood are performed in the usual manner where possible.

c. Where possible, it is obligatory on the worshippers to perform the obligatory prayer from a standing position. They can perform supererogatory prayers from a sitting position, although it may be within their grasp to perform it from a standing position. However, performing it from a standing position is more meritorious.

d. In an obligatory prayer, the worshippers are required to recite al-Fatiha and another surah in the first two rukus. This is not a prerequisite in a supererogatory one. It is permissible for the worshippers engaged in such a prayer to confine the recitation to al-Fatiha, yet reciting a second surah after it is more superior.

e. Should they choose, the worshippers embarking on a supererogatory prayer can recite, after al-Fatiha, any other surah, including those that contain the verses of sajdah; should they opt for that, they must perform sujood and follow the prayer through. This is not allowed in an obligatory prayer though.

The worshippers engaged in a supererogatory prayer cannot be penalized if they were to start reciting a particular surah, then switching to another, with their prayer remaining intact.

f. While it is not permissible to interrupt an obligatory prayer without a valid reason, this can be done to a supererogatory prayer at will.

g. Where doubt or uncertainty about the number of rukus performed arises in a supererogatory prayer, the prayer will not be rendered batil; accordingly, no precautionary steps are called for. The worshipper can settle for the lesser number or greater number of rukus, provided that espousing the latter would not cause the prayer to be null and void. This is contrary to the situation in an obligatory prayer where doubt about the number of rukus could annul prayer in certain situations and necessitate ihtiyat and remedial action in others.

h. It is obligatory to resort to sajdatay-as-sahu for inadvertently doing certain things in prayer; this is not the case in a supererogatory prayer at all.

i. Any extra rukn that the worshipper may perform by way of an oversight renders prayer batil. Supererogatory prayer is immune to this measure.

j. Accordingly, if the worshipper forgets a secondary part, [i.e. not rukn], of prayer and realizes that after he had got beyond it to a fundamental part (rukn), it is permissible for him to carry on, i.e. without repeating the missed part.

This is not the case in a supererogatory prayer, in that the worshippers are required to go back to the point where they think they made the error to rectify it and carry on from there, regardless of whether or not they have already engaged in a rukn or non-rukn part of prayer.

For example, forgetting to perform the second sujoob of the first ruku, the worshippers carried on with their supererogatory prayer, only to realize their mistake after rising from the second ruku. They should have no alternative but to cancel the activity in hand, go back to performing the second sujoob of the first ruku and carry on with their prayer from that point.

k. There are parts of the obligatory prayer that have to be repeated by way of qadha at the end of prayer. This usually happens with parts such as sujoob and tashahhud, when the worshippers realize their lapse after entering into a rukn activity.

In a supererogatory prayer, such a lapse warrants a different treatment. Discovering the mistake may occur while prayer is still in progress or after it has finished. If the worshipper has not done anything that would detract from its form and validity, he is required to repeat that missed part and all the subsequent parts. Should the discovery of the lapse take place after a while, his prayer can still count as valid; he is, therefore, not required to say qadha prayer.

Differences covering some other areas:

It is neither permissible to hold the majority of supererog-Atory prayers congregationally, nor to follow other people in performing them. Most of the obligatory prayers can be held thus.

It is permissible to hold congregational prayer for Istisqa and Eid prayers; some obligatory prayers, such as tawaf, cannot be held congregationally as there is no evidence to support that.

No adhan is called for in supererogatory prayers in general. It is a part of every obligatory prayer, and very much so in the obligatory daily ones. That is, it is not necessary in Ayat prayer, although it is an obligatory one.
Section Three:

FASTING (SAWM)

Chapter One:
Fasting the Month of Ramadhan

Chapter two:
Fasting, other than the of Month Ramadhan
Chapter One:
Fasting the Month of Ramadhan

Foreword

1. Literally, Sawm (fasting) means abstaining or refraining from doing anything including refraining from speech. Allâh, the Exalted said, "...Then if you see any mortal, say: Surely I have vowed a fast to He Beneficent God, so I shall not speak to any man today" (19/26).

Technically, however, it means abstaining from certain things such as food and drink and others during a given time, as will be discussed, Inshâllah.

Fasting on certain occasions, on top of which is the month of Ramadhan, is considered among the most important obligations, as stipulated by Shari'a. It is one of the five pillars of Islam.

Such an obligation is one of the Religion's fundamental truths. Whomsoever rebels against it would be deemed kafir (irreligious or unbeliever). However, whoever recognizes it to be an obligatory devotion, yet shows disobedience by not fasting without an admissible excuse would be blameworthy in this life and in the Hereafter, unless they repented.

In brief, fasting the month of Ramadhan requires the mukallaf to be in a state of taharah from janabah, to abstain from food and drink, and to be mindful of other things called "invalidators of fast" which we will be discussing later. The fast period is from dawn till sunset, i.e. from the start of subh prayer to the start of maghrib.

In making niyyah for fasting, the mukallaf should be seeking closeness (qurbah) to Allah. Fasting the days of Ramadhan, as we have described, starts from the first day till the last one, at the end of which the moon of Shawwal will have been born. The first day of Shawwal marks the festive season, i.e. Eidul Fitr.

Being a lunar month, Ramadhan may consist of thirty or twenty nine days. It is widely the view in scholastic and juridical circles that it cannot be less than twenty nine days.

Just as prayer may be performed ada' or qadha', fasting follows the same rules. Should the worshipper miss the opportunity of fasting the month of Ramadhan, they can do so after it has ended. Fasting may become obligatory on the worshipper not in the context of the month of Ramadhan, rather as a kafrarah, hence the name "kafrarah fasting", or fasting in fulfilment of a vow (nadhr) or oath (yameen), and so on.

Above all, it is a mustahab kind of worship in all days, although certain days and months of the calendar are stressed more to fast than others. Therefore, voluntary fasting during Rajab and Sha’ban is more superior to fasting in the other months.

Sometimes it is haraam to fast on certain days, such as the first day of Eidul Fitr. We shall be discussing, in some detail, the rules regulating all types of fasting.

1. When is it obligatory to fast the month of Ramadhan?

It is obligatory on every soul, capable of meeting the requirements, stated below to observe fasting during the month of Ramadhan:

2. a. Adulthood; this is one of the general conditions for making the mukallaf duty-bound to observe fast; thus it is not obligatory on the person who has not attained adulthood to fast; but if they did they will be rewarded; if such a person attain adulthood not before dawn but after it, they are not required to abstain from food and drink that day, nor are they required to compensate for it by way of qadha’. Should the person who we have just described voluntarily fast that day, i.e. when they attained adulthood, they can continue their fast, in which case it will be accepted; they are therefore not required to compensate for it by way of qadha’. Moreover, they are free not to fast that day.

3. b. Reason (aql); this is also one of the general requirements for making the mukallaf duty-bound to observe fast; thus it is not obligatory on an insane person to observe fast. In order for the obligation to continue the sanity of the mukalla\(fs\) must endure till the end of the day. Even if they lose their sanity temporarily that day, they should be absolved of the responsibility of fasting it. Should the illness of such a persons persist until after dawn, only to recover during the day, the sick persons should not abstain from food and drink, nor are they required to compensate for it by way of qadha.

4. c. The mukalla\(fs\) should not sustain loss of consciousness before they make niyyah for fasting. If unconsciousness befell them ahead of a new day without let-up until after dawn broke, it is not obligatory on them to fast that day, even if they regain consciousness at any stage of it.

Should such persons make niyyah to fast the next day, only to fall victim to unconsciousness and come around after a while during the day, they are required to maintain their fast; fasting that day shall count as part of obligatory fasting.

The same applies to the person who started their day fasting, then became unconscious for an hour or so.

5. d. Women have to be in a state of taharah from the blood of hayd\(h\) or nif\(a\)s throughout the day. Even if bleeding ceases at the first second after dawn, they are not required to fast that day. Should bleeding start a second before sunset of the day, fasting on that day is not obligatory. Therefore, what makes fasting obligatory depends to a large extent on the woman being free from the bleeding of hayd\(h\) or nif\(a\)s throughout the day.
of fast. Should the woman fast the day while still not in a state of taharah, albeit for part of the day, such a fast is not called for at the outset; this, though, will not absolve her from the responsibility of compensatory fast (qadha).

6. e. Safeguarding against harming oneself; should the mukallaf not be immune of harm which may be triggered by fasting, they are not required to fast. All people, who fear that fasting may cause them to be sick, or worsen or complicate a current illness they are suffering from, or they may be reeling from a sickness that had its toll on them so much so that they become frail, are allowed not to fast. Thus, fasting is not obligatory on them.

However, not every adverse effect on health or sickness that may be precipitated by fast would necessarily allow non-fasting or absolve the mukallaf from the responsibility of fasting. Therefore, common ailments, such as headache, slight fever, mild tonsillitis, mild eye or ear infections should not warrant breaking one's fast. But, if such ailments take a turn to the worse which normally cause sensible people to take precautions against, the obligation to fast is waived.

Nevertheless, the degree of a particular health problem is a relative matter, i.e. it varies from one individual to the other; for example a slight rise in the temperature of a person who is already weakened by illness may prove problematic.

7. Should a person who is not feeling well be aware that fasting will not do him any harm, neither would it delay his recovery, he is required to fast.
8. Fear of harming oneself because of fasting may vary. You may be either sure that harm will come your way, or you may think so, or there may be a chance that fasting will affect your health, or there may be a less than 50% chance of damage to one's health; yet it is sufficient to cause alarm, such as fearing for one’s eye sight, albeit there may be only 30% chance of harm; or in a fifth case, there may be very slight chance which does not pose any cause for alarm.

In the first four examples, there is a case for not fasting. In the fifth, not fasting is not permissible; it becomes obligatory.

9. Should the worshippers, in the cases where non-fasting is permissible, go ahead and fast causing harm to themselves, what would become of their fast? In other words, would it be accepted and, therefore, absolve them from compensatory fast, or would it be deemed batil and, therefore, require them to fast in lieu?

A. Such a fasting will not be accepted; the worshipper cannot be absolved of the responsibility of fasting qadha’.

10. Should the worshippers fast in the belief that they are not going to put their health in harm's way, only to find out that the damage has been done. Would fasting in this case be accepted from them and thus absolve them from the responsibility of compensating for it?

A. Yes, the fast is valid; they are, therefore, not required to fast in lieu.

11. If the worshippers fast although they had thought that going ahead with fast would adversely affect their health, only to find out that it did not, would their fast be accepted and, therefore, absolve them of the responsibility of fasting qadha'?

A. This fast should be accepted and no qadha' is required from the worshipper, provided that:

a. the sort of harm should not be of the category which the mukallafs are debarred from embarking on to start with, and are liable for punishment if they flouted the law.

b. The type of fast they observed is one that they embarked on with niyyah of qurban, such as they may be ignorant of the law that makes it unlawful for the sick to fast; conversely, they cannot put this aside and make niyyah of qurban, although they are certain of their ill health.

12. The worshippers may wake up after dawn has broken while they are nursing a sickness of the sort that allows them not to fast. They did not do anything that might have invalidated fast, only to get better during the day. Such, worshippers are not required to make neither a fresh niyyah, nor abstain [from food and drink]; furthermore their fast is null and void and are therefore required to compensate for it by way of qadha'.

13. Despite their certainty that they are well and fit to fast, worshippers were advised by competent physicians that fasting would cause them harm. They are required to comply with the doctor's advice, although they are sure that there is no cause for alarm. However, if they discover for certainty that the doctor was in the wrong, they should ignore his advice and go ahead with fast.

14. The worshippers may be in a better position than that of the doctor to judge that their ill heath could further be undermined, if they were to fast, yet the doctor's advice to them was assuring, in that fasting will not cause them any harm. What should they do - act according to their own urge, or follow the doctor's advice?

A. They should act according to what they think best for themselves, unless their feeling of fear is largely misguided as is generally the case of those who are apprehensive of the doctor's advice.

15. f. Fasting should not lead to putting the worshipper in an untenable situation, so much so that it may prove a major problem of life. For example, fasting may prevent them from going about their business or performing their duties which is the source of their income, in that it may prove detrimental to one's physical health which in turn adversely affects their capacity to work or think straight, or it might cause them severe thirst of the sort they cannot bear, etc.

In such a case, it is obligatory on the worshipper to seek an alternative arrangement with a view to fasting, but without undue difficulty. It could be by either changing one's job, postponing it [taking leave], or depending in sustaining oneself on one's savings, etc. Failure to achieve that should absolve them from fasting. However, it is desirable for such worshippers, as a matter of voluntary obligation, not to behave as though they are not fasting. They should make do with the bare minimum which makes them carry out their work without great difficulty or embarrassment; they are, though, required to compensate for any missed periods of fast by way of fasting qadha where possible.

16. f. The worshippers should not be on a journey (musafir), or, in a more precise expression, they should not have become liable for praying qasr because of taking to the road, i.e. a traveller, or musafir. That is, a traveller is, [by law], not required to fast. Should he insist on fasting it will be in vain; consequently, he is not absolved from the responsibility of fasting by way of qadha, except for one case:

That is, if he was ignorant of the law which debars travellers from fasting. Such fast should be in order, unless they became aware of the legal requirement during the day. But, even if by coming to know about the law, he insists on maintaining fast, such fast is batil.

Fasting is, therefore, obligatory on (a) those who stay put in their domicile, (b) the travellers who are not required to pray qasr, such as (b/1) those who intend to observe a ten-day stay in one place, (b/2) those whose work involves travel, (b/3) those who embark on unlawful travel (safaril ma'siyah), and (b/4) those who spend at least thirty days [in travel] in a particular place without being able to reach a decision whether to stay [the ten-day period] or move on.

17. It is permissible for the worshipper, prior to the advent of Ramadhan or after its arrival, to embark on travel, even without the need for it or in a bid not to fast; and although this is permissible, it is bound to spoil the chance of the worshipper to reap a great reward.

18. Should a person travel during the day of their fast, does he have to carry on fasting that day?
A. Should travel take place, from the periphery of the home town of the worshipper, before noon, no fasting is required, yet it should be performed by way of qadha'. This is regardless of whether the decision to travel was taken overnight or after the breaking of dawn. Nor would it matter, if the worshipper travelled quite a distance from his town or are still close to it, so much so that its buildings are still within his eyesight.

Should he travel at the afternoon, his fasting that day is obligatory; he has to make sure, though, that it is over and done.

19. Assume that the dawn broke while the worshipper was still travelling. On arriving at his destination, he decided to stay the ten-day period. What should he do?

A. Had this traveller broken his fast before getting to his hometown [destination], he would have not been required to fast; he has though to compensate for that day by way of qadha' at some other time. Had he not broken his fast before he got to their destination, he should take one courses of action, depending on the time of day. If his arrival was before noon, it is obligatory on him to make niyyah for fast and carry on thus; this fast would count as obligatory one. Conversely, i.e. arriving sometime in the afternoon, he is not required to fast and has to compensate for the day he missed.

What would happen to a worshipper who starts his day at his hometown, then make a return journey at the same day before noon?

A. It is most desirable, as a matter of obligatory precaution, that he should make niyyah for fasting and do fast, then resort to a measure of voluntary precaution in fasting that day by way of qadha'.

20. There are situations where the mukallafs know that a sort of eventuality will arise that may prevent them from fasting the day, such as haydh, nifas, sickness, travel, etc. Let us suppose that the mukallafs knew beforehand that such a thing will happen to them, can they not fast that day ahead of the occurrence?

A. No, it is not permissible. The mukallaf should embark on fast at the outset until the development, which would usually absolve the mukallaf of maintaining fast, actually takes place. So, if a woman knew that her period would start after an hour, she is not permitted to break her fast before bleeding starts. The travellers too are not allowed to break their fast before they have embarked on their journey and travelled some distance where they cannot see anybody from their place of domicile, nor can anybody else see them.

21. h. Both men and women, who have reached old age, say of seventy, that may have caused them to be frail and consequently find it hard to fast. They have the choice of either fasting or not observing fast. In case they choose not to fast, they are required to give fidya, which is three quarters of a kilo of wheat, bread or any other type of food for every day of the month of Ramadhan they decide not to fast. This fidya should be given to the poor. However, such old people are not required to fast qadha'. Should they reach such a stage of frailty that it becomes very difficult for them to fast, or that fast would put them in harm's way, they are free not to fast and without the need to give fidya, nor fast in lieu.

22. i. Persons afflicted with perpetual urge for drinking water (utash), making it rather difficult for them to fast, are free to fast or not to fast; should they choose not to fast, they have to give the sort of fidya that has already been mentioned in the preceding paragraph. Should fast exasperate their condition, they can be exempt of fast without the need to give fidya.

23. j. An expecting mother, who is very close to the date of giving birth, fearing for the safety of her unborn baby, is permitted not to fast; she can give fidya instead and fast qadha for every day she had missed. However, if potential harm, of the type which might adversely affect the mother's health, was envisaged, she is not required to fast, nor give fidya, since the fifth of the general requirements of fast is missing.

24. Just as the pregnant mother is not required to fast, should doing so put her unborn child in harm's way, a nursing mother is worthy of receiving the same treatment; she can compensate by way of giving fidya and fasting qadha. The same rule, of the pregnant mother, applies if fast would lead to endangering the nursing mother's health. However, this is not the case with women who do not breast-feed their babies, or the baby is bottle-fed; that is, if this was not harmful to their babies well-being.
2. Obligations During Fasting

The person fasting the month of Ramadhan is required to fulfil the following:

a. Niyyah; since fast is an act of worship, there must exist an urge to embark on such a devotion with the exclusive objective of seeking closeness to Allah, the exalted. Adhering to the requirements of fast, be they upholding what is required or abstaining from what is forbidden. As is the case in other devotions, things that are haraam (forbidden) or batil are liable to invalidate fast.

26. You may want to ask: Assuming that niyyah is the catalyst for embarking on any work; and the niyyah of qurban means that the command of Allah is the motivation for taking to such a devotion. Yet, it is rather difficult to assume it in all the cases of fast. For example, there may be people who, although observant of fast, they sleep most of the day, forget about food or drink, or simply shun it altogether. Thus, it could be said that the rationale behind such a person's abstaining from food and drink is not Allah's injunctions. Would this invalidate fast?

A. No, it would not. It is sufficient for niyyah of qurban to be countenanced that the worshipper is simply taking to this act of worship in compliance with Allah's command that requires him to abstain from food and drink, when he is either asleep, unaware, or averse to food and drink. That is, so long as the worshipper is sure that he is not going to eat and drink, even if he was not asleep, unaware, or averse to food and drink, this is good enough a niyyah.

27. For niyyah to be valid it suffices that the fasting person embarks on fasting the day from dawn till sunset, provided that he does not have in mind any type of fast - e.g. kaffarah - other than that of the month of Ramadhan. Failure to uphold that would result in annulment of both the fasts.

28. During the month of Ramadhan, the niyyah of the fasting person should not be delayed beyond dawn. There is, however, a number of issues when the worshipper fails to make niyyah until dawn has broken due to being asleep, or because of an oversight, and so on.

(a) If such worshippers have maintained their abstention from food and drink and found about the problem before zawaal, they should make the niyyah and carry on fasting, in which case it will be accepted from them.

(b) Should this happen after zawaal, abstaining from food and drink and observing fast should also be the norm, in which case they have, as a matter of obligatory precaution, to compensate for the day by way of qadha'.

Should the worshippers either inadvertently or out of ignorance break the state of maintaining restraint from food and drink, they should act as though they were fasting; they are therefore required to fast in lieu (qadha').

Suppose that a worshipper started his day without the intention to fast. This was a deliberate act of rebellion against Allah's injunctions. Later that day, he went back to his senses and repented; what he is required to do is to masquerade as a fasting person; accordingly, he should compensate for that day by fasting at some other time.

29. You may ask: If it is not permissible to delay making the nияyah until after dawn has broken, is it permissible to bring it [niyyah] forward, say, making it over-night?

A. If it is at all within the capacity of the worshippers and that such a niyyah is sufficient for them, unless they change their mind, they are permitted to do so; fasting with such a niyyah is sound. Moreover, even if at the inception of the month, making one niyyah for fasting the entire month of Ramadhan would also do, provided they do not change their mind. If this has been the case and the worshippers remained, for a reason or the other, asleep for, say, two days or more, they would still be considered fasting all the period they remained asleep.

30. Niyyah is obligatory for fast right from the beginning; continuity is another prerequisite. Thus, he who intended to break his fast at any day of Ramadhan, or wavered in continuing with fast, such fast would be deemed ba-til. That is, irrespective of this taking place before or after zawаal. However, he must put a show as though he was fasting, and fast qаdha at some other time. That said, should this person reconsider his position by going ahead with his fast, provided he did not take to food and drink, his fast would still be in order; however, espousing ihtiyаt, in carrying on with fast and compensating for it later, should not be abandoned.

31. The worshipper may apply some sort of medication say eye drops, only to grow suspicious that it could detract from his fast. Having equivocated, he sought advice; he came to know that using eye drops would not do any harm to one's fast. Would the period of equivocation because of doubt render his fast as batil?

A. Such equivocation should not render fast null and void, so long as the worshipper made his niyyah of fast with the belief that the eye drops would not invalidate it.

32. It is not necessary for the niyyah of fast that the worshipper is conversant with all that which may invalidate fast, which he is required to avoid. It suffices, at the time of holding niyyah, that he finds himself capable of avoiding those things that would make him break his fast; that is, coming to know about them gradually, or by avoiding any thing they suspects might detract from his fast.

Being in a State of Taharah at the Time (Dawn) of Embarking on Fast

33. b. Should the worshippers be in a state of janabah, they must perform ghusl before the onset of dawn (fajr). Should they deliberately and knowingly avoid ghusl until dawn has broken, they have, as a matter of ihtiyat, to continue their fast, make up for that day, and pay kaffarah.

34. The same ruling applies to a worshipper who due to an oversight forgot to perform ghusl, also on the basis of ihtiyat. However, in their case, they are not required to pay kaffarah.

35. While still awake at night, should the worshippers do that which requires them to perform ghusl, they cannot, as a matter of ihtiyat, go to bed before having performed ghusl. That is, unless they are used to waking up before dawn, either as a matter of course or by way of an alarm clock, to perform ghusl.

36. If, overnight, the worshipper was involved in a sexual activity, of the sort that usually leads to a state of janaabah, and slept without the intention of performing ghusl, until it was dawn, they are treated as though they deliberately avoided ghusl while still awake.

Should this happen to persons who are not bent on taking ghusl lightly, yet they are not of the type known to waking up, their way out is to fast as a precaution measure in the hope that it will be accepted by the Almighty; they should also resort to ihtiyat wujubi (obligatory precaution) by fasting qadha' and paying kaffarah.

Should this happen to a person, who is used to waking up in time to have ghusl by way of an alarm, yet he could not wake up, his fast remains valid, i.e. nothing extra is required from him.

However, if waking up happens in between, [i.e. before the start of fast], the worshipper should not go back to sleep, unless he is absolutely sure that he is not going to be denied the opportunity of having ghusl in time. If by going back to sleep second time round he takes a chance of waking up again to perform ghusl, yet this did not materialize, he has to hold his fast and compensate for the missed day by way of fasting qadha', as a matter of obligatory precaution; he is not required to pay kaffarah though. The same applies, if the waking up and going back to sleep recurred more than twice.
37. Should the state of janabah come about as a result of having a dream and extend till dawn, the fast in such a case is valid. However, should the worshippers wake up from their sleep and find out about the occurrence, it is desirable for them, as a matter of ihtiyat, not to go back to sleep before they performed ghusl. That is, unless they are confident that they are not going to let the opportunity of performing ghusl slip away.

However, should the worse happen, in that they could not wake up second time round, they are better advised to hold their fast and fast in lieu; they are, though, not required to pay kaffarah.

Should this happen to a worshipper who is not used waking up in time to do what is required of them, his cue is to [do all three], i.e. stick to his fast, compensate for the missed day, and pay kaffarah; that is based on ihtiyat.

38. Married couples are not allowed to engage in sexual union closer to the small hours of the night, i.e. closest to dawn, in which case they could be left with no time to have ghusl. Should this happen, by either deliberately flouting the law or inadvertently, they are required to perform tayamum instead of ghusl. In so doing their fast would be valid; they are however not required to stay awake until the onset of dawn. Should they neglect performing tayamum until it was dawn, they should resort to ihtiyat by holding their fast, fasting in lieu of the missed day, and paying kaffarah.

39. Women experiencing hayd or nifas should hasten to perform ghusl once they know that they became clean again. If they ignore this until after dawn, it is obligatory on them to fast qadha. This is so, when there is still time to perform ghusl. Otherwise, tayamum could substitute ghusl. However, their fast would still be valid, if they were not aware of the cessation of their haydh or nifas until after dawn.

Although touching a dead body before dawn warrants ghusl, yet the worshipper is allowed to postpone it until after dawn.

40. In all the cases where it becomes obligatory on the worshippers to have ghusl before dawn, they are allowed to perform tayamum instead of ghusl where the latter can endanger their health or there is not ample time to perform ghusl. This would do for holding fast.

41. Should a woman be experiencing a major or medium istihadha, does she have to uphold all ghusls she is required to perform in order that her fast be valid?

A. Apparently, the validity of fast does not depend on such a woman’s performing the ghusls that are required of her in a prayer context. Although it is required for the validity of prayer, it is desirable that ihitiyat should be applied, i.e. by performing the daily ghusls to make fasting good. As for nightly ghusls, they have nothing to do with fast.

Avoiding Things that Invalidate Fast

d. Avoiding things that render fast invalid should be practised by the worshipper observing fast during the fasting period as a matter of course. These have been discussed by jurists; here I will discuss them alongside any remarks I may deem necessary:
42. a. and b. Food and drink, be it in big or small quantities. Whether such food was of the usual stuff or unusual one, such as swallowing stones or dust or drinking oil, is of irrelevance; this is based on ihityat wujubi.

This ban covers even the minute pieces that may be lodged between the worshipper's teeth. Swallowing [Inhaling] dust, be it light or heavy, is not capable of invalidating one's fast. That said, there is no harm in espousing ihityat regarding the heavy type of dust. The same applies to vapour and smoke; on that basis the ruling on smoking, which although considered objectionable (haraam), is that it is not among the things that invalidate fast.

The following pose no threat to one's fast. (a) Swallowing anything that has been regurgitated. (b) Swallowing one's saliva whether deliberately or inadvertently. (d) Wearing antimony or using eye/nasal drops, although the drops might find their way to one's stomach. (d) Pouring medical solution onto an open cut, having an injection on medical grounds; if the solution is injected with the aim of feeding, it is considered as food and drink, in which case it is not sanctioned, hence the ban on the use of nutritive substances (mughathi). (e) Consuming any food or drink by other means, such as through one's nostrils, should have the same adverse result on one's fast. (f) Feeding an ill person through an incision in their body is also not allowed; in short what is forbidden is supplying food and drink to the body by way of mouth, nose, or through an incision, including intravenous feeding.

43. c. Sexual Intercourse.

44. d. Masturbation, irrespective of the way used to bring it about. Should semen be passed without any activity, there is no harm in that, in which case fast is valid. If, upon embarking on that which could lead to ejaculation, the persons were intent on not letting it happen to them, yet it did eventually happen, they can continue with their fast and are not expected to take further action. If the doers were not so confident that they would not come, yet they did come, they have to fast qadha' and pay kaffarah.

45. e. Concocting falsehood (kathib) against Allah, His Messenger, and the [Infallible] Imams (a.s.) has been considered among the actions that invalidate fast. However, based on ihtiyat (al-aqwa), this cannot be said to invalidate fast, although it is among the cardinal sins. That said, should the worshipper commission such an act, it is desirable for him to perform fast by way of qadha'.

46. f. Of things that could invalidate fast is submerging one's whole head in water, be it just the head or as part of the entire body. However, strictly speaking, it should not be considered thus. Still, one should, as a matter of obligatory precaution, avoid doing it.

47. g. The use of anal syringe for injecting fluid, baring solids, should, on the basis of obligatory precaution, detract from the validity of fast. However, using same for both man and woman reproduction organs can be tolerated.

48. h. Vomiting can upset one's fast and eventually render it batil, as a matter of obligatory precaution, even if it takes place on health grounds; however, if it was pivotal to the patient's recovery, it can be tolerated, although the fast would still be batil.

If vomiting occurs naturally, it will not adversely affect one's fast. Even if something is regurgitated without actually reaching the vicinity of the mouth, it too can do no harm to one's fast. But once this food reaches the mouth, it must be thrown out. If it deliberately gets swallowed, fast should, therefore, be deemed batil, and the worshipper has to compensate for the missed day of fast and pay kaflarah.

49. These are the things that invalidate fast. There is nothing more to them. So, whosoever is in doubt about anything that may invalidate fast, should consult this list carefully; if it is listed, the worshipper should comply with the ruling so passed. Otherwise, fast remains intact.

Nevertheless, we would like to reiterate that the following are not among the things that invalidate fast: cupping, use of injection in the urethra, dallying with one's wife - without sexual intercourse and ejaculation, smelling perfume, and sitting in [a tub filled with] water, even if it covers one's whole body.

Rules Concerning Things that Invalidate Fast

Fast should be deemed batil, if any of the said things takes place, except the following:

50. a. Anything commissioned by the worshippers unintentionally would not detract the fast.

51. b. Should the worshipper do anything which is included in the eight-item list, in the belief that it is not, only to find out later that it is, this would not affect the validity of fast.

52. If the worshipper is involuntarily made to flout the ban, this would not detract the fast.

53. Exceptions to the principle of things happening to the worshippers without their consent are the following:

a. Suppose someone fills his mouth with water without contemplating to drink it. However, while turning the water inside it, some of the water seeped into his stomach by accident. Such are required, as a matter of voluntary precaution, to compensate for the fast of the day. That is, barring this happening as a result of the worshipper's using the water as mouthwash as part of wudhu for an obligatory prayer, as rinsing the mouth in this context is mustahab, in that it can be tolerated.

b. Having embarked on playing with his woman, the worshipper unintentionally ejaculated. He can still hold his fast, provided that he is, at the outset, confident not to cause any ejaculation.

54. d. The worshippers could suspect whether dawn has already arrived, then checked to find out the truth of the matter. Having reached a conclusion that it had not, they ate and drank. Afterwards, they discovered that it was already dawn time. Their fast should still be valid.

At the other end of the spectrum is another worshipper who, although faced with the same problem, did not bother to check for themselves. Thus, he took to food and drink in the belief that was not time for dawn yet. Although, he is not deemed guilty, he could be penalized by compensating for that day by way of qadha', should he find out to the contrary.

The same applies to those who break their fast prematurely in the dying moments of daylight, believing that the day has drawn to a close after having noticed what seemed to be darkness, despite clear skies. Their fast is batil; they are, therefore, required to make up the day they squandered and pay kaffarah. If the cause of the darkness was something else other than clouds, the same rule applies as a matter of obligatory precaution. Should there be clouded skies, the fast stands, without the need for further action.

If there was no darkness, and the worshippers suspected that it may be time for breaking the fast, they are not allowed to do so. Should they go ahead and break their fast, they would be deemed sinful, their fast batil, and it becomes obligatory on them to repeat the fast by way of qadha' and pay kaffarah. That is, unless it transpired to them that it really was time for the end of fast, in which case they should not worry about taking further action.

The same applies to the persons who broke their fast despite the existence of plausible evidence that it was not dark enough for anyone to break his fast. Such people should compensate for that day by way of fasting qadha' and pay kaffarah.

For those who break their fast after attaining certainty that it is time to break their fast through either personal experience or reliance on sound proof in support of such conclusion, they cannot be deemed sinful, nor can they be made to pay kaffarah. However, if they find out that they were in the wrong, they have to hold their fast. And although they are not required to repeat fasting the day by way of qadha', espousing ihitiyat in performing qadha' fast should pose no harm.

General Rules

55. The worshippers, who have to observe fasting during the month of Ramadhan yet for a reason or the other they have to abrogate it, should be allowed to eat and drink that day. However, it is desirable that they should behave as though they were fasting. That is, except in certain cases where we have already ruled that abstinence (imsak) should be upheld.

Whenever fast is declared void and null, qadha' becomes obligatory. This is so, irrespective of whether the lapse was brought about as a result of flouting the first condition, i.e. niyyah, or the second, i.e. ghusl, or the third, i.e. not keeping one's distance from the things (muftiraat) which render fast batil.

56. Kaffarah will not become obligatory for merely leaving out niyyah of fast or invalidating it, although making up for any lost days of fast is obligatory. That is, unless the worshipper commission that which would render fast null and void (batil), or deliberately staying asleep while in a state of janabah until dawn breaks. Obligatory kaffarah should be introduced in the light of the following guidelines:

57. a. The worshipper should have, at will, done that which is bound to invalidate their fast.

58. b. The worshippers should not have been coerced to break their fast; in such a case, although their fast would be batil, no kaffarah is due.

59. c. The worshippers should not be aware that what they did was lawful; conversely, no kaffarah should be due. That is, irrespective of whether or not they were aware that fast is not obligatory on them right from the start, or they mistakenly believed the Law-giver did not rule that the thing they commissioned is among the things that breach fast.

60. Kaffarah is obligatory on him who intentionally invalidates his fast by staying in a state of janabah overnight, i.e. by not having ghusl until its already dawn time; this is based on ihтиyat. This covers the case of the worshipper who missed the chance of having ghusl because of oversleeping. That is, irrespective of the fact that he had the intention of waking up to perform ghusl, yet was not used to waking up before dawn.

In the Chapter of Kaffarahs (penalties), we will discuss in some detail, the kinds of kaffarahs stipulated for invalidating one's fast during the month of Ramadhan.

61. Should the worshippers be in a state of uncertainty as to the coming of dawn, they may continue eating and drinking, until they are absolutely sure that dawn has already broken, at which point they should abstain from food and drink. They may as well depend, in determining the arrival of dawn, on the testimony of a trustworthy person.

That said, in trying to ascertain the time of dawn, the wor-shipper is not required to personally investigate the matter. However, if they carry on eating and drinking, only to discover that dawn has already come, they are required to perform compensatory fast. The exception to this rule is the case of a person reaching the conclusion that the time for dawn did not arrive, after having checked the matter for themselves, i.e. as discussed in para (54).

62. Should the worshippers be uncertain about whether or not it was time for ending their fast at the end of the fasting day, it is not permissible for them to do so, unless they directly, or indirectly - through the testimony of a knowledgeable person or adhan, made sure that it was. If they unduly hastened to break their fast, they would be liable to perform fast by way of qadha as well as pay kafrarah. That is, barring the fact that it transpired to them that they were in the right.

63. The worshippers may experience unwarranted ejaculation, i.e. not of their own making, such as having a dream while asleep during the day of their fast. In such a case, they are not required to hasten to have ghusl; they can go back to sleep, thus postponing having ghusl so long there is still time for prayer.

3. Ascertaining the Birth of the Moon

The New Moon’s Birth

64. Ramadhan and Sha’ban are lunar months. They may consist of either twenty nine or thirty days according to the cycle of the moon around the earth from west to east.

Like the earth, half of the moon faces the sun and the other half does not. The half that faces the sun reflects its light; the one that does not is dark. When the moon completes its revolution around the sun, the situation of darkness and light on both its sides reverses.

In its revolution around the earth, the moon occupies such a position between the earth and the sun that its dark side faces the earth, turning its bright side away from it, where it completely cannot be seen. A second position is that of the earth coming between the sun and the moon. A third positions the one in between.

When the moon reaches a stage where it is completely hidden to the naked eye, this is called "waning of the moon", or moonlessness (muhaq). Once the moon starts moving away from this position, the edge (crescent), of its side which is facing the sun begins to emerge, i.e. a new moon is born. This sets forth the cycle of the moon around the earth. This is called "conjunctional movement" (harakah iqtiraniyyah), because its start is determined at the point where the moon is lined up with both the earth and the sun, taking a centre position. The moment the new moon is seen heralds the moving away of the moon from the pivotal position.

In no way can the lunar calendar month be less than twenty nine days or more than thirty days. As for the shari'i lunar calendar month, it too can consist of thirty or twenty nine days, but not more, and not less.

65. The possibility of sighting the moon, not the sighting itself, is the basis to be reckoned with [to determine the start of the month]. This is so because sighting may not be forthcoming for either the process of sighting is not practised, or there may be obstacles capable of hindering sighting, such as clouded skies. Thus, the shari'i month may start.

There is no difference in doing the sighting, i.e. whether it was done with the naked eye or aided by scientific devices, because both lead to the same result, i.e. sighting the moon.

66. Different countries go their different ways in sighting or non-sighting the moon, i.e. it could be sighted in a country but not the other. What is the ruling in this regard?

There are two issues here:

a. The difference in the sighting, or otherwise, of the moon could be attributed to a simple detail, such as the presence of clouds in one of the two countries. In such a case, the sighting of the moon in country (a) can make up for the sighting in country (b) for the same reasons we have just discussed in para. (65).

b. The two countries may vary to a great measure in relation to their respective positions on either the longitudes or the latitudes, so much so that sighting the moon in one is more feasible than the other, let alone the presence, or lack of it, of any obstacle, such as clouds or fog.

This could be expounded in two cases:

a. Suppose that country (a) falls on a certain longitude in such a way that sunset occurs a very long time ahead of its occurring in country (b) because of the variance in their respective position in relation to the longitudes.

As we have already illustrated, the moment the moon is born, it starts breaking away, only to become more sightable; each night wares off gradually following the shape and rotation of the earth from east to west. Thus, sunset in one country may take place minutes, or even hours, after it has done so in another one commensurate to their respective position on the globe. Sunset in each longitude falling to the east comes before that falling to the west and vice versa.

For example, sunset may take place in a country like Iraq at the same time the moon emerges from its pivotal position between the earth and sun, i.e. a new birth. It is impossible to sight the new moon in such a situation because of its minuscule size. After few hours it can be possible to sight it because the bright stretch of the moon becomes easily visible by virtue of its breaking away from its pivotal point (muhaq). Thus, when sunset takes place, few hours later, in a country falling to the west of Iraq, the sighting of the moon will have become readily possible.

b. The other assumption is that of two countries occupying positions on the same longitude, i.e. sunset takes place at the same time in both the countries. Yet, they are apart from the equator, as they fall on two different latitudes. As you may know, the length and shortness of the day is also determined by the latitudes. Another factor which has an impact on this matter is the period during which the crescent stays visible in the horizon of this country or the other. Assume that its presence in one country was so short that it could not be sighted, and that it dwelled for a rather long spell in the other country to give ample time to the beholder to sight it; this is how the difference in the possibility, or otherwise, of sighting the moon could come about.

What distinguishes one country from other in relation to the possibility of sighting the moon could be determined by their respective positions on the longitudes. Those occupying a westerly position to the other country, as well as a different latitude, allow a longer spell of dwelling for the crescent to be sighted.

This discussion is bound to lead to posing the following questions:

a. Different countries experience the birth of the new moon at varying times for a number of reasons. Should one deduce that each country should have its own horizon for sighting the moon and therefore the start of their lunar month? This is so because it is born in a westerly horizon earlier than an easterly one, or should the start of the lunar month be one for all countries, having sighted it at any point in the horizon?

b. In other words, is the advent of the shari'i lunar month a relative one, following the different horizons, in the same way sunrise behaves - such as the sun rises in the sky of Detroit but not in the sky of Damascus, making it a fact in Detroit and not so in Damascus? So, does it follow the same logic, or is the arrival of the shari'i lunar month an absolute matter and an independent astronomical phenomenon that is constant, in that it has nothing to do with the way different countries are scattered around the globe?
A. In response to this question, juridical research has come up with a theory; it lends support to the second assumption. It propounds that the inception of the month cannot be relative following where any particular country or area is located. It further suggests that it is wrong to judge the relativity of the start of the month by the variant sighting of the moon in different countries.

The theory maintains that sunrise happens as a result of this or that part of the earth facing the sun at this or that moment in time; and since different parts of the earth face the sun in turn by virtue of the earth's round shape and its rotation around its axis, it is natural that sunrise is relative.

As for the inception of the lunar month, it comes about as a result of the moon breaking away from its pivotal point of its alignment with both the earth and sun. This is a specific astronomical phenomenon concerning the position the moon takes in relation to both the sun and the earth. It should, therefore, follow that such a phenomenon is not bound to be affected by this part of the earth or that; thus, neither assuming relativity makes sense, nor suggesting that the month starts in this part of the world on, say, a Saturday evening, and in another part on a Sunday evening.

The latter does not hold water too from of the methodology of research perspective. That is, because it does not make allowance for the difference between the natural lunar month and the shari'i one; the natural lunar month starts with the breaking away of the moon from its pivotal position of alignment and is not prone to be affected by any other factor. Since this occurrence could be viewed as a specific astronomical phenomenon, i.e. not yielding to this position or that, the theory of relativity does not make sense.

The start of the shari'i lunar month is determined by two factors:

a. Astronomical, i.e. the point at which the moon breaks away from aligning position in relation to both the sun and the earth (muhag), and

b. The bright part of moon facing the earth should be visible. However, the possibility, or otherwise, of sighting the moon could be viewed as a relative matter, pursuant to the different areas in the globe; it could also be construed as an absolute one, not relenting to any influence.

So, if we mean by "the possibility of sighting" that sighting by man in this part or that of the globe is relative, making the start of the shari'i lunar month a fact in every part of the globe, following the sighting in that particular point on earth, it may start in one part and not the other. But, if we take the "possibility of sighting" to mean the possibility of sighting the moon even in any part of the world, this should herald its arrival to all the parts, and hence its absoluteness, i.e. the start remains one, despite the variance of the areas of the world.

It is evident, therefore, that since the birth of the shari'i lunar month is contingent on the crescent month, in addition to the possibility, or otherwise, of sighting it, and that such sighting can be feasible in certain parts of the world and not the others, it is plausible that the start of the month is relative.

The right methodology to ascertain whether or not the start of the shari'i month is a relative one is by consulting the sha-ri'a itself. It has made the start of the month dependent on the sighting of the crescent moon. Here, we should attempt to find out whether the shari'a made the birth of the month in every area exclusive to that particular area, or the sighting thereof can be taken as a benchmark for all regions of the world.

What we can deduce, though, from juridical evidence gives credence to the second assumption, i.e. if the crescent is sighted in any spot of the world, this should be taken to mean that the start of the month is one everywhere.

How does the sighting of the crescent moon come about?

We have already seen that the start of the shari'i lunar month depends on two factors: (a) the breaking away of the moon (muhaq) from the point which aligns it with both the earth and the sun, and (b) sighting it is feasible. Now, we should try to explain how best these can be achieved in a true shari'i way.

The following tools can be used:

67. a. Direct sighting with the naked eye as such sighting would enable the person carrying it out to see the crescent moon emerging and that it is possible to see for oneself. That or modern technology gives credence to the emerging of the moon and of the possibility of seeing it.

68  b. The testimony of other people who have made the sighting. However, there must exist one of two things for such testimony to be viable:
As for the first tool: He availability of numerous and varied types of witnesses for the news of sighting to become both commonplace and credible. However, should there be a large number of witnesses and neither knowledge of the sighting nor having peace of mind about it for a good reason, the sighting of the moon shall be deemed non-existent. That is, although the great number of witnesses may aid certainty, it is not everything in the equation.

Any sensible person must be able to take into account all that which may cast doubt on the reliability of the witnesses.
The following examples should further explain what we are aiming at:

1. Suppose there were forty persons, in one town, who gave evidence that they had sighted the crescent moon. The strength of evidence of those people are greater than that of the same number of witnesses scattered over forty towns all over the world. This is because the chances of error that could emanate from the forty witnesses of one town is remote, contrary to those of the forty different towns.

2. Following on from the previous example, the opposite may happen, in that the witnesses of the one town may be given to emotions that are non-existent in the case of the witnesses of the other towns.

3. Just as it is necessary to ascertain the credibility of those who came forward and testified that they had sighted the moon, so is it necessary to take into consideration the number of people who, despite taking part in the lookout for the new moon, did not manage to affirm such sighting. The greater their numbers and clearer the weather in their respective areas, especially if such areas were close to the [forty-witness] town, the greater the propensity to cast doubt over the final result.

4. The quality of witnesses has a great impact in reaching a conclusion [on the sighting of the crescent moon]. That is, there is a great difference between forty witnesses who are readily given to lying, and another forty witnesses who are not known, and a third group who is known for their probity in some measure.

5. A number of testimonies, in one place, may achieve unanimity, in that a group of people, who took it upon themselves to be on the lookout for the new moon, all took a vantage point in relation to the horizon. Suppose one of them managed to sight the new moon. Pointing to the direction where he sighted it, another one managed to confirm the sighting, and so on. Thus, the testimony of the first witness is corroborated by the testimonies of other people in the group. Such testimonies should be credible because the possibility of their falling prey to error is rather remote.

6. Random agreement of certain details of different testimonies of a number of witnesses in one town, such as concurrence of both the time they sighted the moon and the time they said it disappeared, would inspire confidence that the sighting really happened.
7. Just as scientific tools have a positive role to play in confirming the sighting of the new moon, so have they a negative role on the process. That is, should there be no sighting done using such methods, this is bound to shake the confidence of man in the testimonies of ordinary folk no matter how great their numbers were.

8. What comes into play as well is scientifically [astronomically] predicting the birth of the new moon, in that it is bound to detract from any testimony of sighting the moon prior to the predicted date/time of the birth. This is irrespective of the fact that, although there is a margin of error in the prediction process, it may not be farther than the error that could tinge the testimonies. To say the least, the scientific evidence can still delay giving credence to the veracity of the human testimony.

69. b. The second tool: The Evidence

Such an evidence could be recognized when two factors become readily available:

1. Two male witnesses, known for their probity, should testify that they have sighted the new moon. Neither the testimony of one such man should be relied on, nor should the testimonies of women, although they may be of impeccable character.

2. The testimony of both men must be coherent.

3. There must not be strong proof pointing to the error of the evidence of the witnesses or that they have made a mistake. For example, two witnesses, out of a great number of people who were keeping a vigil to sight the new moon, could be the only two who claim to have sighted the moon. This is bound to detract from their evidence, especially when it is known that they were among a large number of people in the same spot, that they all have average eyesight, and that the weather was favourable.

70. c. The lapse of thirty days of the moon of the previous month. This is because the lunar month cannot be more than thirty days. So, even if the new moon could not be sighted, a new lunar month should start.

71. d. The Ruling of the Marji'. Such a ruling is enforceable and should be complied with, even by those who had no access to the validity of the evidence they used in reaching such an edict; this takes the following into account though:

1. The mukallafs have not the slightest idea about the validity, or lack of it, of the edict of the Marji' in such a case, they should not have any alternative but to follow the edict.

2. The mukallafs may have an inkling that the Marji' may have got it wrong, despite their knowledge and probity; in this case too, they should follow the edict of the Marji'.

3. The mukallafs may have reached the conclusion that the evidence the Marji' used was not sufficient to have made him arrive at his judgement. This could be on the side of the witnesses who the mukallafs know are not up to scratch, regardless of whether they may have lied. In this case, the ruling of the Marji' will have no enforceable power and the mukallafs are not bound to follow it.

4. The mukallafs may know for sure that the month has not yet started and that the Marji' has made an error of judgement in declaring its inception prematurely. In this case, the mukallafs do not have to follow the ruling of the Marji'; they are free to act upon their own conviction.

What we mean by the "Marji's confirming the start of the month" is the fact that he issues a statement to this effect and urges the Muslims to adhere to his ruling. Should the Marji' reach such a conclusion, yet he did not make it public, this is not sufficient for anyone to act upon it, except for those who attain personal satisfaction.

Once the Marji' issued a statement confirming the start of the month, all believers, including those who do not follow him in taqleed, yet believe that he fulfills the requirements of Marji', must comply with his ruling.

72. e. It's not sufficient for the scientific efforts to confirm that the crescent moon has moved from the point of alignment with the sun and earth (muhag), they also have to confirm that it could be seen by the naked eye.

73. There are circumstances where the nature of the new moon can suggest that it was born the night before in spite of the fact that it was not sighted then. Things like its forming a semblance of a ring, the density of its bright side, and the length of its dwelling, so much so that it does not set until after dusk.

However, realistically speaking, such phenomena of the moon cannot be espoused as an exclusive evidence that it was born the night before. What all this can prove that the new moon may have emerged of muhaq at an earlier time to appear in such a look. It should then follow that it may not be possible that it could have been sighted at the sunset of the previous day. The length or shortness of the period the new moon emerging from its aligned point with both the sun and the earth should not be taken as a yardstick for determining that the moon is one night older.

Generally speaking, it is not permissible to rely on guesswork in ascertaining the birth of the new moon of the months Ramadhan and Shawwal, nor is it permissible to rely on the computations of speculative astronomers.

Miscellany

74. Once the crescent moon of the month of Ramadhan has been officially sighted, fast becomes obligatory. Likewise, once the crescent moon of Shawwal has been sighted the fasting season comes to an end.

Should nothing point to that which confirms that the month of Ramadhan has started, in one of the following ways, starting fast from the following day is not obligatory. It is not permissible to fast that day with the intention that it is part of the month, so long as its start has not been officially declared.
However, one can fast that day as part of the month of Sha'ban by way of voluntary fast or a compensatory one. The worshipper may also fast the day with a double-edge niyyah, i.e. by simply leaving it open-ended - to work for both the possibilities: Should it later on transpire that the hanging day was really part of the month of Ramadhan, the fast would be accepted as such.

75. Come the thirtieth night of the month of Ramadhan and with it the inconclusion that the month of Shawwal has not officially arrived yet. Fasting the following day becomes obligatory. If, however, it was found out that the month of Shawwal has already been with us, and that it should have been the first day of the Eid, which is haraam to fast, there will be no harm as long as the worshipper fasts that day fully aware that the next month has not begin.

The mukallafs may reach some sort of conclusion that the following day will be the first of Shawwal. Yet, they neither entertain the idea of breaking their fast because of lack of conclusive lawful evidence, nor do they want to fast, for fear it might be the start of Eid. To overcome the impasse, they may resort to ihtiyat by way of embarking on lawful travel; this should, however, be undertaken overnight; should they delay it until day time, it is obligatory on them to make niyyah for fast and abstain from food and drink until they are far away from their place of domicile, getting passed heddet-tarakhkus (The point at the periphery of a town where, for example, adhan could be heard. This concerns distances to determine whether prayer should be said tamam or qasr), as has already been discussed in para. (20). One may suggest that this worshipper may have already committed that which is haraam by fasting that day believing it to be a Eid day?

A. What is haraam is fasting the whole Eid day; fasting part of it is not.
Chapter Two:

Fasting, other than the Month of Ramadhan

1. Compensatory Fast

Who must compensate for the fast of the Month of Ramadhan?

1. Whoever did not discharge their responsibility of fast should compensate for it by way of qadha'; They must do so by fasting an equivalent number of days they have missed. This is regardless of the reason for not fasting, i.e. be it voluntary or involuntary; the exception being the following:

2. a. Those who have not yet attained adulthood.

3. b. An unbeliever turned Muslim. An apostate, re-embracing Islam, must compensate for any periods of fast they did not observe.

4. c. Those who enter a state of unconsciousness prior to making niyyah for fast.
5. d. Those who abandon fast because of old age or persons afflicted with perpetual urge for drinking water (utash), i.e. the subject of paras. (21-22) of the previous chapter.

6. e. Those who could not fast due to illness that continued to the next month of Ramadhan. Such should pay the fidya stipulated in para. (21) just mentioned.

Rules Concerning Qadha'

7. Whoever has a fast liability, should not be in any rush to discharge it; it could be postponed for months, provided that this does not lead to apathy. However, should the delay continue until the following month of Ramadhan, qadha' and fidya would become due, as has been discussed in para. (21) of the previous chapter.

This should cover both types of people who fail to discharge their fast liability in good time. Among them is he who takes longer time until the arrival of the following month of Ramadhan and he who is not bent on leaving it to drag on had it not been for a spell of illness they suffered close to the time which made them miss their target of fasting in good time.

The amount of fidya, however, is not going to increase in the light of the extended delay of dispensing with the qadha' fast.

8. Just as it is not imperative that one must hasten to relieve oneself from the responsibility of fasting qadha' for missed days during he month Ramadhan, so is not imperative to fast for days on end; that is, if you are indebted by, say, two days, you can fast one of them and postpone the other to some other time.

9. In case a worshipper has a fast liability of two Ramadhan months. They have the choice to start fasting any one of them. Should they start with the previous one, but not the latter until the year comes to a close, they should be liable for paying fidya for it in addition to fasting qadha'.

If fasting qadha' was done without specifying for which of the two months it was, this is allowed; however, in such a case, the worshippers should practically consider themselves discharging the responsibility towards the earlier month. It should, therefore, follow that if they confined their compensatory fast to one month, they would attract fidya for the second month.

10. Should the worshippers end up doing compensatory fast and another one of an obligatory nature, such as that of kaffarah, they are free to start with whichever.

How should one go about performing compensatory fast?

11. Fasting qadha' is more or less like fasting the days of Ramadhan; the differences are:

12. a. The niyyah for fasting qadha' can be postponed until before midday. If it is already midday, there will be no chance to make niyyah, as a matter of ihtiyat. According to this premise, if the worshipper has made niyyah to perform compensatory fast for Ramadhan at dawn, only to waiver in between, and go back to his original \textit{niyyah}, his fast would stand so long as that the indecision took place during the period from dawn till before midday. This, of course, is contrary to fasting the month of Ramadhan where waivering in making the \textit{niyyah} would render fast \textit{batil}, let alone when the worshipper is resolved to break their fast.

13. b. Some jurists have stipulated that \textit{niyyah} of fasting any day's \textit{qadha} should not be made earlier than its night. For example, if you want to fast on a Saturday, you are not allowed to make \textit{niyyah} on the day of a Friday alone; that is, it must be renewed when night falls on Friday till midday on Saturday.

However, this is not obligatory, provided that the worshippers' fast should be based on the \textit{niyyah} they made on the day of Friday.

14. c. The \textit{niyyah} should be exclusive to performing compensatory fast of Ramadhan, i.e. fasting in vacuum, or just for the \textit{niyyah} of \textit{qurbah} per se, will not do. Failure to do so will not absolve one from the responsibility of \textit{qadha}.

15. d. Experiencing ejaculation while asleep and remaining in a state of \textit{janabah} until after dawn does not allow the worshippers to carry on with their \textit{qadha} fast that day, contrary to the same situation in the month of Ramadhan where fast will both be in order and obligatory.

16. e. It is permissible for the persons who are observing \textit{qadha} fast to break their fast at any stage before midday. However, if they deliberately do so after midday, they are liable to pay \textit{kaffarah}, as will be discussed in the chapter dedicated to that. Breaking one's fast in the belief that it is halal to do so should not attract any penalty.

Those who fast on behalf of others can break their fast at any stage of the day, i.e. even after midday without attracting any kaффarah. However, if they are hired to fast a particular day, they cannot break their fast on that day, even before midday for they have to honour their obligation. Yet, if they break their fast, they are not liable to pay kaффarah.

17. It is permissible to fast by way of qadha' after the lapse of the month of Ramadhan on any day of the year, apart from certain days when fast cannot be sanctioned; this will be discussed in paras (26-36) Fasting qadha' cannot be tolerated from a travelling person whose duty it is to perform qasr prayer, from a person who is relieved from fasting on medical grounds, and from a woman who is in a state of either hayдh or nifas.

18. Managing Doubt

Harbouring doubt as to whether or not one has to perform compensatory fast for the whole of the month of Ramadhan or part thereof should be dismissed, i.e. it is not obligatory to go for qadha' fast.

Doubt about whether one's fast was in order should be treated in the same way.

Suppose certain worshippers had to break their fast for one day. They do not know whether they had a valid reason to do so, such as being on a journey or having fallen sick, and subsequently have to compensate for it. Maybe, they were in breach of the fast, in which case they should be liable to perform compensatory fast and pay kaffarah at the same time. How should they go about this matter?

A. They are required to fast qadha', no kaffarah shall be due.

A. Worshippers who know that they have missed a number of days during which they did not fast for a reason or the other. However, they do not know the exact number of days. What should they do?

A. They must fast the minimum period of any two periods. For example, if they knew that the missed period was between one week and two weeks, fasting one week would do.

Should one become doubtful about whether they have absolved themselves of the responsibility of fasting any outstanding days, they have to have another go.

The Son Standing in for His Father

19. If the father had a liability to perform compensatory fast, and passed away without discharging it, it is obligatory on his son to shoulder such a responsibility. Should there be more than one son, the eldest should be the one to carry the burden. If there were two sons of the same age, they should jointly be responsible, in exactly the same way of performing prayer by way of qadha’, i.e. para. (32) of the General Guidelines of the Chapter on Prayer.

If at the outset, a person is not required to fast either on health grounds or for setting out on a journey and subsequently die, no qadha’ on the son shall be due.
2. Fasting by Way of Kaffarah or to Compensate for a Missed Opportunity

Fasting becomes obligatory on certain occasions, such as a self-imposed penalty (kaffarah) to seek pardon for commissioning a sin, or compensating for an obligation:

20. a. Fasting by way of kaffarah for not observing fast during the month of Ramadhan. Whoever rebels against the injunctions by not fasting the month of Ramadhan, they are liable to kaffarah, as has already been discussed in para. (56) of the Chapter on Fasting. This kaffarah involves either the emancipation of a slave, or feeding sixty poor people, or fasting two months, one of which must follow on from a previous one, albeit for one day.

21. b. Fasting by way of kaffarah for leaving Arafat prematurely. As part of hajj rituals, wuquf at Arafat is required for the period from midday of the ninth of Thil Hijjah to the sunset of the same day. Should the pilgrims choose to exit Arafat prematurely, i.e. before sunset, they are required to compensate for this haste by slaughtering an animal. Should this type of kaffarah not be feasible, the pilgrims have the alternative of fasting for eighteen days, although not in one go.

22. c. Fasting as a compensation for hady. As part of Hajj-ut-Tamatu', it is obligatory to sacrifice an animal (hady) at the day of Eid. Should this not be feasible, the pilgrim can compensate for it by way of fasting for ten days.
23. The form of obligatory fast by way of kaffarah or compensation is the same as that of fasting in the month of Ramadhan. However, there are few differences. In kaffarah type of fast, there is no harm in a fasting person waking up in the morning only to find out that they have had a sexual experience that led to ejaculation. This, though, is contrary to observing compensatory fast for the month of Ramadhan. The latter too cannot be sanctioned in a context of travel, whereas some types of kaffarah/compensatory fast can be sanctioned in that context:

a. Fasting by way of kaffarah for leaving Arafat prematurely.

b. Fasting for ten days in compensation of hady is usually divided into two stages; fasting for three days while the mukallafs are still in travel, i.e. before returning to their homeland.

Observing fast by way of kaffarah for not fasting the month of Ramadhan cannot be tolerated while the worshipper is on the move (musafir).

3. Voluntary Fast

24. Volunteering fast on all days, save those of Ramadhan and particular forbidden days - the subject of paras. (35) onward, is mustahab.

Tradition has it that fast is a shield against hellfire and that it is a purification of body and soul. Through fast the worshippers are admitted to paradise; their sleep is viewed as a kind of worship, their silence a sort of \textit{tasbih}, and their du'a is answered. The fasting persons have two happy moments: the first when they break their fast, and the second when they meet their Creator.

\textbf{Who qualifies for voluntary fast?}

25. Fasting is \textit{mustahab} for the worshippers, provided that:

a. They should not be suffering from an ailment or fasting could adversely affect their health.

b. They should not be travelling, except for fasting for three days while in the Holy Madinah to attend some business, especially on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday consecutively, as a matter of \textit{ihtiyat}.

c. Women should not be experiencing either \textit{haydh} or \textit{ni-fas}.

d. The worshippers have no liability for the month of Ramadhan compensatory fast. Should they be observing an obligatory fast by way of \textit{nadhr} and the like, they can embark on a \textit{mustahab} type of fast. The same applies for those who hire themselves to fast for other people.

Just as it is not permissible for the person, dealing with compensatory fast for the month of Ramadhan, to personally observe \textit{mustahab} type of fast, so is it not permissible for him to volunteer his services for fasting on behalf of others. However, he is allowed to hire himself for fasting for the others, in which case the fast shall be in order, even though he might have a liability for fasting by way of \textit{qadha'}.
It is also permissible to observe mustahab type of fast while on a journey, so long as he cannot perform the obligatory fast.

Q. As you have already explained, the worshippers cannot embark on a mustahab type of fast while still having to contend with an outstanding period of fast. Can they, though, take up a nadhr to perform a voluntary fast, and thus turning it into an obligatory one and eventually giving it precedence over any outstanding period?

A. Such a nadhr is batil to start with; it should, therefore, follow that fasting by way of nadhr is invalid, if it was observed before discharging one's responsibility towards compensatory fast. Should the worshipper promise a vow (nadhr) to observe a mustahab type of fast without specifying that it comes first, such a nadhr becomes enforceable. To absolve one of the responsibility towards both the liabilities, he has to start with the qadha' fast first, then the mustahab one.

Women do not require their husbands' permission to engage in voluntary fast. That is, unless the husband objects to that on the grounds that they want to enjoy their wives' company.

26. The Niyyah. It is sufficient to make niyyah of qur-bah for voluntary fast the night before. However, the time for making niyyah spans the whole day, in that if the worshippers did not do anything which may detract from the validity of fast, they can still make niyyah for fast, even if it comes within hours or minutes before the time of ending the fast. Not making niyyah or not contemplating fast for all that time is immaterial, so long as the worshippers remained in a state of abstention.

27. Its Form. Voluntary fast is performed in the same way as that observed during the month of Ramadhan, and its qadha' for that matter. Where it diverges is in the fact that it is permissible for the mukallafls to remain in a state of janabah until after dawn. Fast thus observed is in order, contrary to the fast of the month of Ramadhan, be it Ada' or qadha''. Where voluntary fast is also different from fasting the month of Ramadhan by way of qadha' is in the case of waking up in the morning with an experience of a sexual encounter, in that it is permissible to carry on with voluntary fast that day, as opposed to fasting the month of Ramadhan by way of qadha'.

28. Rules Regulating Voluntary Fast. The worshippers have the choice of breaking their fast whenever they wish, be it before midday or some time in the afternoon, regardless of the way they choose to do so. However, inadvertently breaking one's fast would not detract from fast.

29. Voluntary Fast May Become Obligatory. This may come about due to an emergency, i.e. by way of a pledge to, an oath by, or a covenant with Allah, the Most High. Once turned obligatory, this mustahab fast assumes a different set of rules:

30. a. Should the worshippers pledge to fast on a particular day, they have to make niyyah for doing so at the outset, i.e. they are not permitted to delay making the niyyah until after dawn, let alone dragging it until before midday, which is the case in the voluntary fast. That said, one can maintain that it is permissible to delay it until before zawaal, notwithstanding the practice of ihtiyat by way of qadha'.

31. b. Should the worshippers pledge to fast a particular day, they are not allowed to break their fast that day, neither before midday nor after it. Should any day be picked at random for observing their fast, they are free to break such a fast whenever they wish, provided that they fast another day.

32. c. In fasting for a nadhr, it is obligatory on the person to do that with the intention of absolving one's responsibility of the pledge he made. Failure to do so would result in leaving the nadhr as though it was not met.

33. d. The worshippers can still travel, if need be, on a day that has already been earmarked for fast by way of nadhr. However, they should compensate for the said day by way of qadha'.

34. e. Should the worshippers pledge a fast by way of nadhr, making it obligatory to implement, it is permissible for them to observe it, even while on a journey. That is, with the proviso that they, while making nadhr, stipulated that their fast would be during travel time or that they undertook to absolve their responsibility of fasting irrespective of whether they were present or away on a journey.
4. Forbidden Fast

Types of such fast are the following:

35. a. Fasting the first of Shawwal, i.e. the day of Eidul Fitr.

36. b. Fasting the tenth of Thil Hijjah, i.e. the day of Eidul Adhha.

37. c. Fasting the eleventh, the twelfth, and the thirteenth of Thil Hijjah, by those who are present at Mina and engaged in hajj devotions or for any other reason.

The exception being: The obligatory fast of any two of the sanctuary months (Thil Qi'dah, Thil Hijjah, Muharram, and Rajab) as a kaffarah for killing [man slaughter] in certain cases. It is permissible to fast and include the Eid and other days.38. d. Every unlawful fast, such as that observed by a sick person, a woman in a state of haydh or nifas, fasting for a nadhr by way of thanksgiving for commissioning a sin (say, for killing a believer), and the fasting of a travelling person, except the case discussed in paras. (24, 26, and 35).

Among unlawful fast is that which is extended until after sunset; it is not valid. However, should the mukallafs, who are intent on ending their fast on time, delay so doing unintentionally, their fast is in order, even if they did not break their fast that night.

Also among unlawful fast is that which is observed on the day which could be among the days of the month of Sha'ban and Ramadhan. Should the worshippers fast that day, although it was not proved conclusive as part of Ramadhan, it will not be accepted from them, as has already been discussed.
in para (74) of the previous Chapter.

Refraining from speech, as part of fast, cannot be sanctioned.

39. The fourth type of unlawful fast is different from the first three ones in one aspect. In the first three, fast is forbidden, even if it is not observed with the niyyah of qurbah; conversely, the fourth type is forbidden when it is observed with the niyyah of qurbah; it shall not be haraam, if it is not observed with the niyyah of qurbah; it would not be deemed lawful. It would be considered as a personal judgement.

Corollary

39. Appended below is a comparative summary of the types of fast and rules regulating them.

Invalidators of Fast (Mufatiraat). All types of fast share things that render fast invalid.

Things commissioned inadvertently (sahu). All types of fast are immune to being breached, if the worshipper did anything unintentionally.

Niyyah. During the month of Ramadhan, niyyah should not be delayed until after dawn. However, should the worshippers be taken unaware with the arrival of the month of Ramadhan, yet no niyyah was contemplated, their fast should be in order, if becoming aware of the problem takes place some time before midday and with it the making of the niyyah afresh.

The same applies to fasting by way of nadhr on a particular day.
Delaying the niyyah until after midday in all obligatory types of fast cannot be sanctioned.

In voluntary types of fast, it is permissible to delay making niyyah until after midday.

Deliberately Remaining in a State of Janabah until Dawn Time. This is not permissible during the fast of the month of Ramadhan, as a matter of ihitiyat. The same applies to kaffarah and compensatory types of fast. There is no harm in doing it in voluntary types of fast, even if it turns obligatory by way of nadhr, oath, or pledge.

Waking up after Experiencing a Sexual Encounter that Led to Ejaculation. This should not detract from any type of fast, except fasting of the month of Ramadhan by way of qadha‘, as a matter of ihitiyat.

Forgetting about One’s State of Janabah until after Dawn. This would render fasting of the month of Ramadhan, both Ada‘ and qadha‘, null and void, as a matter of ihitiyat. It will not affect other types of obligatory or voluntary fast though.

Calling the Fast off and Annulling it. This is not permissible in every fast that has been undertaken that day, such as any day the month of Ramadhan or the day the mukallaf specified to fast on by way of nadhr. This however is permissible in the other cases, be it before midday or after it, except for fasting of the month of Ramadhan by way of qadha‘, where it cannot be tolerated is when it takes place after midday; it can, though, be done at any time before it.

Kaffarah. No kaffarah is due on leaving out the niyyah in an obligatory fast, especially without calling fast off. Nor should there be kaffarah for unlawfully taking to food and drink, except for two cases: not fasting during the month of Ramadhan and calling fast off some time in the afternoon in compensatory fast for the month of Ramadhan.

As for the worshipper who does not fulfill his vow to fast a particular day without valid and lawful reason, he should pay kaffarah of nadhr as soon as he abandoned the idea of fasting. This is regardless of whether he broke his fast by actually eating or drinking. This will be discussed in some detail in the Chapter dedicated to Kaffarah of nadhr, oath, and pledge.

Fasting While in Travel. Neither fasting the month Ramadhan, nor compensating for it in travel, which normally requires the traveller to perform his prayer qasr, can be sanctioned. Observing voluntary fast during travel cannot be tolerated, unless it has turned obligatory by way of nadhr, provided that the person making the nadhr stipulates that he carries it out during travel as has already been discussed in para.(34). There is, however, one case where fasting during travel can be tolerated, i.e. the one mentioned in para. (25).

Certain types of kaffarah and compensatory fast can be sanctioned during travel. However, that which cannot be tolerated is fasting by way of kaffarah for not fasting during Ramadhan.

Fasting of a Sick Person. Fasting, any type of fast, by a sick person, whose health can adversely be affected by fasting, cannot be deemed valid. Also, those with good reasons not to fast, as has already been discussed in para. (6) of the previous chapter.

Fast by women in a state of haydh or nifas cannot be sanctioned.
Section Four:

I'tikaf (Retiring for Worship)
Foreword

1. Literally, i'tikaf means dwelling on something in a place. Technically, it means retiring to the mosque with the aim of busy engagement in worship.

Such type of worship has been sanctioned by the Holy Qur'an, the Sunnah, and consensus.

It seems that, after rejecting the idea of monasticism and shunning life, deeming it both wrong and negative, Islam has put forward the enterprise of i'tikaf as a temporary and limited experience. It is a unique way to transporting the worshippers to the realm of spirituality with the aim of strengthening the bond between them and their Creator. Such worship would enable man to increase his provision in this world for the hereafter.

Having had a spiritual nourishment, the worshippers could now go back to their daily routine with an unwavering heart and a firm faith.

Basically, i'tikaf consists of three days of seclusion in a mosque adopting a specific regime, on top of which fast and sexual abstinence.

Requirements of I'tikaf
The requirements that should be fulfilled are:

2. a. Reason (aqīl).

3. b. Faith (īmān).

4. c. Niyyah of qurbah at the outset, and throughout the period, of i’tikaf.

As we may know that niyyah of fast can be made overnight. Can this be the case in i’tikaf, i.e. by retiring to the mosque the night before with the intention of starting it at the start of the day?

A. Yes, it is, apparently, in order.

Most important, the worshipper should aim at making the niyyah of qurbah, not to covet more of supplication and prayer, although this is more superior.

5. d. Fasting the entire period of i’tikaf, i.e. three days, in that whomsoever is not fit for fast should not be fit for i’tikaf; for example, just as the fast by a sick or a travelling person cannot be sanctioned, i’tikaf by them cannot. However, there is a case for sanctioning the i’tikaf of the traveller who makes a nadhr to fast in their travel, as has already been discussed within the context of voluntary fast in the Chapter dedicated to Fasting the month of Ramadhan.

A worshipper observing i’tikaf can make niyyah for fasting any type of lawful during the period of i’tikaf. That is, he can embark on compensatory fast, of the month of Ramadhan, kaffarah fast, and voluntary fast, provided that they fulfill the requirements of the latter; among these is that he must not have any liability of any obligatory type of fast, as has already been discussed. Therefore, whoever intends to take to i’tikaf outside the month of Ramadhan should first address such a liability, if any.

Just as it is obligatory that the fast of the person taking to i’tikaf be valid, so is it obligatory that the days meant for i’tikaf be valid, in that i’tikaf cannot be sanctioned on either Eidul Fitr or Eidul Adhha, for example.

Whatever detracts from fast should equally detract from i’tikaf and therefore renders it batil.

6. e. The period. The minimum is three days, i.e. with two nights in between. It could be more, e.g. three days and four nights, or even more than that; for example, the worshipper could make niyyah to start i’tikaf from Friday night till the sunset of Monday.

7. f. I’tikaf should be in a main mosque, for it is not known that i’tikaf in a small one can be accepted.

Such main mosque must be identifiable, in that it is not permissible to hold i’tikaf in two mosques, albeit they may be adjacent to one another, i.e. by spreading the period of i’tikaf on both mosques. Accordingly, if it becomes untenable to stay in one mosque to complete one’s i’tikaf, such i’tikaf will be batil.

The entire building of the mosque is treated as the place for practising i’tikaf. Even if the worshipper makes a niyyah to observe i’tikaf in a particular place within the building, this should not have any importance, in that he is free to move around the mosque’s building.

8. g. The worshipper should not venture out, unless for either lawful pursuit or any other business that the generality deem acceptable. An example of the first type, i.e. lawful pursuit, is going out to perform ghusl of janabah, for they are not allowed to stay in the mosque and perform ghusl there, even though this may be feasible. An example of the second type of business is going out to seek medical treatment in the event of falling sick.

Among the instances of going out for performing ghusl, other than that for janabah, is any of the other obligatory ghusls, e.g. that of touching the body of a dead person, regardless of whether or not it may be possible to perform such ghusls within the setting of the mosque itself.

Should the worshipper venture out without good/lawful reason, their i’tikaf cannot be taken seriously, and thus be rendered batil; the exception being the following:

a. Going out to visit/treat a patient.

b. Going out to take part in a funeral.

c. Going out not of one’s own volition.

Venturing out without valid reason either through ignorance of the rules or inadvertently, the worshipper must, as a matter of ihtiyat, deem their i’tikaf null and void.

Whenever the worshipper is allowed to leave the mosque to attend a lawful business outside it, he should confine his travel to the shortest distance possible within the vicinity of the mosque. While en route, he should do his best to avoid sitting; should he find it necessary to sit, he must avoid sitting in a shaded place.
9. h. One should refrain from doing all the forbidden things mentioned in the forthcoming paras. (10 to 15). Should he be in breach of any, his i'tikaf should be rendered batil.

It is recommended for the worshipper, as a matter of ih-tiyat and obligation, to treat their i'tikaf batil, even if he commissioned any of these points either inadvertently or through ignorance of the rules.

Should such a breach occur on the third day of i'tikaf, it is desirable for the worshipper, as a matter of ih-tiyat and obligation, to finish his i'tikaf in the hope that it might be accepted, although he should not take it for granted that it would.

What is required from the worshipper taking to *i'tikaf?

Throughout the period of i'tikaf, the worshipper should avoid engaging in any of the following:

10. a. The company of women, be it through sexual intercourse or any other way that may lead to sexual enjoyment, such as petting.

11. b. Causing sexual ejaculation through masturbation of any kind.

12. c. Smelling perfume, such as rose oil.

13. d. Enjoying the smell of flowers, such as jasmine and rose.

14. e. Engaging in trade, barring things like tailoring, cooking, and weaving... etc.

Should the worshippers engage in buying and selling, their \textit{i'tikaf} should be deemed null and void. Yet, any deal struck is sound and therefore enforceable.

15. f. Hypocritical indulgence in vain talk aimed at scoring a victory over the others, irrespective of whether or not the subject being debated was a valid one, and no matter whether or not it was religious. If the argument was an objective one aiming at proving a truth or putting right an erroneous conclusion the others have reached, there is no harm in engaging in such a showdown.

Rules of \textit{i'tikaf}

16. In itself, \textit{i'tikaf} is both a recommended and \textit{mustahab} act of worship. It may become \textit{wajib} as an eventuality, e.g. becoming wajib in fulfilment to a \textit{nadhr}, pledge, or oath.

17. Once embarked upon, \textit{i'tikaf} can be called off at any time, except in the following cases:

a. When \textit{i'tikaf} is embarked on as part of \textit{nadhr} to be taken up on particular days. Should \textit{i'tikaf} be embarked on without specifying the days, the worshipper can call it off.

b. The lapse of two days on the worshipper's \textit{i'tikaf} should warrant the completion of the period of \textit{i'tikaf}, unless the worshipper has, at the outset, made a covenant with his Creator that he could call \textit{i'tikaf} off whenever he wished on certain circumstances. If he even does so in the third day of \textit{i'tikaf}, he could take it up at another time.

18. Should the \textit{i'tikaf} of a worshipper be annulled for any reason, how should he go about making amends?

A. There is a number of issues here:

a. Should the i'tikaf be a mustahab one and is brought to a halt through a breach before the lapse of two days, no repeat shall be required.

b. Should the i'tikaf be a mustahab one and has been breached after the lapse of two days, a repeat, though not immediate, shall be required.

Should i'tikaf be undertaken in neither the right place nor the right time, such as not in a mosque or starting i'tikaf on Eid day or one or two days before that, it should be halted and no repeat is required.

c. If i'tikaf be embarked on specific days in fulfilment of a nadhr, a repeat shall be required. This is irrespective of whether the nadhr was confined to those days where i'tikaf became null, such as specifying Thursday, Friday, and Saturday within a ten-day period, or any other days within those ten days.

However, the repeat of i'tikaf by way of a specified nadhr has to be qadha because it would fall after the lapse of that specified period of time without the need to do it immediately. As for the second case, the repeat has to be undertaken before the end of the ten-day period, because it is in compliance with, and fulfilment of, the nadhr within its specified time, in that it is obligatory to discharge one's responsibility in accordance with the period stipulated in the nadhr.

19. Should the worshippers flout the ban on sexual contact, they shall be liable to pay kaffarah, regardless of whether the breach took place during the day or night. However, no kaffarah shall be due if other banned things are commissioned, yet the worshippers must ask forgiveness.

Should the worshipper practising i'tikaf have sexual contact with their wife during the day while either fasting Ramadhan, whether ada' or qadha', he shall be liable to pay two kaffarahs, one for falling foul of the rules of i'tikaf and the other for breaching the sanctity of fast.

The nature of kaffarah for breaking i'tikaf through sexual activity will be discussed in the Chapter on Kaffarah.

Should the worshipper concerned, who has fallen foul of the rules regulating i'tikaf - by indulging in sexual activity, be carrying out i'tikaf on particular days by way of nadhr, he shall be incurring a third kaffarah for violating the terms of nadhr.
Section Five:

Hajj and Umrah
Foreword

1. Hajj is among the social acts of worship. It has great significance both spiritually and socially. In a way, it is akin to i'tikaf, in that it is a step into the realm of the Almighty. The difference is that in i'tikaf the experience is individual, whereas in hajj it is collective where all Muslims charged with the obligation or embarking on the devotion voluntarily seek to be at the same place and time to practice the same set of rituals.

In certain parts and obligations, umrah is like hajj. After assuming ihram, umrah’s scope is confined to attending at al Masjidil Haraam, Safa and Marwah and carry out the required rituals there. Hajj, on the other hand, has a wider scope where some of its rituals have to be practised outside Makkah, thus requiring travel to Arafat, Muzdelifah, and Mina.

Generally speaking, hajj is mustahab, except one’s first hajj where it is obligatory on the worshipper who can afford the journey. Umrah Mufradah is also mustahab, except for the first one which is obligatory on the person who can afford it.
2. Those living more than sixteen farsakh (i.e. between 86.4 to 88 km) have to embark on umrah then. Hajj thus performed is called Hajj-ut-Tamatu. Umrah is the first part of Hajj-ut-Tamatu.

Should such people not have the means to perform hajj, yet can afford to perform umrah, the latter is not obligatory, although it is mustahab to embark on it.

3. Those living closer to the Masjidul Haraam have to perform hajj, starting with hajj and ending with umrah. This type of hajj is called Hajjul Ifraad. Umrah here is regarded as an independent act of worship, i.e. not predicated on hajj, hence the name "Umrah Mufradah".

Should the worshippers, who live within the vicinity of Makkah, not be able to perform hajj, yet they can perform umrah mufradah, it is obligatory on them to perform it, contrary to the worshipper who lives far away. This is because the umrah of the distant worshipper is part of their hajj, and should they not be able to perform hajj, umrah would not become obligatory on them.

The worshipper's first obligatory hajj is called Hajjatul Islam.

4. Every mukallaf, whether coming from a far-flung place or living in the vicinity of Makkah, who wants to perform a voluntary hajj, can choose either Hajj-ut-Tamatu or Hajjul Ifraad. Should they wish to perform umrah outside the season of hajj, they have to opt for umrah mufradah. That is, such a worshipper is not allowed to embark on Umrat-ut-Tamatu because it is part and parcel of Hajj-ut-Tamatu', i.e. it cannot be performed outside the prescribed time for hajj.

5. Umrah mufradah has no specific time. Should the worshipper choose to perform it in a particular month, they can do so and repeat same, if they so wish in the same month, let alone in the same week.

Being an integral part of hajj, Umrat-ut-Tamatu' cannot be performed outside the months of hajj, i.e. the start of Shawwal to the ninth of Thil Hijjah, provided that it is feasible to perform umrah, wear ihram, and be able to observe wuqaf at Arafat at midday of the ninth of Thil Hijjah.

Since Hajj-ut-Tamatu' is the most common type of obligatory hajj required from the majority of the faithful, we shall discuss it briefly.

1. The Obligations of *Hajj-ut-Tamatu'

The obligations of Hajj-ut-Tamatu' consists of those obligations the pilgrim is required to fulfill in Umrat-ut-Tamatu' to start with and those required from him in Hajj-ut-Tamatu' in the second place.

The Obligations of *Umrat-ut-Tamatu'

6. The duties of Umrat-ut-Tamatu' are five: Ihraam, tawaf, tawaf prayer, sa'y between Safa and Marwah, and taqseer, i.e. clipping one's hair or nails.
Ihram comes on top of the list of duties. It has to be worn from one of the five meqats (certain sites where the pilgrim is required to wear ihram before entering Makkah) should the route take them through any one of them. Should this not be feasible, wearing ihram can be undertaken from a point parallel to any of the said meqats, or from a place far away from Makkah by way of nadhr, provided that it be harder than wearing ihram from the meqat; should nadhr be a sort of refuge from troubles of ihram, it would not be valid and therefore such ihram be deemed null and void.

The five meqats are:

a. Masjidush Shajarah, which is close to Madinah.

b. Qarnil Manazil, on the way from at-Ta'if to Makkah.

c. Juhfah. It used to be an inhabited village in yester-years. It is situated some two hundred and twenty km away from Makkah. It is way away from the usual routes leading to Makkah from both Jeddah and Madinah. However, the pilgrim has to go there, if they so wish

d. Wadil Aqiq.

e. Yalamlam.

Makkah is considered a meqat for Hajj-ut-Tamatu', Hajjul Qiraan and Hajjul Ibraad as will be discussed. The place of accommodation of the mukallaf is considered a meqat, should it be closer to Makkah from any official meqat. This also applies to those arriving for hajj by air at Jeddah; although it is sufficient to wear ihram from Jeddah, ihram from Juhfah, and going back to Jeddah, is desirable on the basis of voluntary ihtiyat.

7. How should one go about ihram?

Wearing the two garments of ihram, one like a sarong and the other as a cover for the shoulder and the upper body, the pilgrim should make niyyah to perform Umrat-ut-Tamatu, as part of Hajjatul Islam. The pilgrim should then chant talbiyah, i.e. (Labayka Allahumma labayk, Labayka La Sharika Laka Labayk). Once talbiyah is over and done with, the pilgrim enters into the state of ihram, in which case certain things become out of bounds for them, such as sexual activity, wearing perfume, and wearing stitched clothes, as will be discussed.

Before ihram, it is mustahab to perform ghusl, although this has nothing to do with the validity of ihram, in that ihram shall be in order even if the pilgrim is in either a state of janabah or haydh.

Wearing the two-piece ihram is obligatory on male pilgrims; it is not so for women, in which case they can wear their ordinary clothes.

Once ihram is assumed, the pilgrim should head towards Makkah to perform the second of devotions, i.e. tawaf around the Holy Ka'ba for seven rounds.

8. The way to conduct tawaf is by standing beside the location of Hajjaril Aswad, either close to or away from it, taking into account that the Ka'ba is on the worshipper's left. The worshipper should, then, make the niyyah for tawaf of Umrat-ut-Tamatu, and circumambulate (go round) the Ka'ba seven times, starting each round from Hajaril Aswad and ending it there.

For the pilgrim to embark on tawaf, they have to observe certain things:

a. Taharah from hadath.

c. Covering one's private parts; this has already been discussed in paras. (9 and 10) of the General Guidelines for Prayer.

d. A male pilgrim should be circumcised. However, it has to be so in the case of the discerning (mumayyiz) boy, who assumes his own ihram. As for the undiscerning boy, or the discerning one who was made to assume his ihram by his guardian, it is not clear whether they should be circumcised, although circumcision is required as a matter of ihtiyat.

Harbouring any doubt as to the number of rounds of one's tawaf is bound to render it batil.

Making an eighth round with the intention of making it part of one's tawaf should render the tawaf null and void.

9. Once the pilgrim completes tawaf, performing tawaf prayer, which is the third duty of Umrat-ut-Tamatu', becomes obligatory. This prayer consists of two ruku's, i.e. similar to subh. The pilgrims have the choice of reciting audibly or inaudibly. They should endeavour to choose a place that is behind, but close to, Maqam Ibrahim (a.s.). Should this not be feasible, performing prayer in any place in the Mosque could be sanctioned, provided that it is behind the Maqam, not ahead of it, not losing sight of the proximity of the prayer place to the Maqam. This ruling is based on voluntary precaution (al ahwatil awla).

10. After that, the pilgrim has to head towards Safa and Marwah, close to al Masjidil Haraam. This is the fourth duty of Umrat-ut-Tamatu'.

The way the pilgrim should go about it is thus: Making niyyah of qurbah for sa’y between Safa and Marwah for Umrat-ut-Tamatu' of Hajjatul Islam, the worshipper must set out walking briskly from Safa to Marwah and back seven times, four times from Safa to Marwah and three times from Marwah to Safa; thus the end of sa’y should be at Marwah.

In sa’y, it is not obligatory that the worshipper be in a state of taharah neither from hadath nor from khabath; they do not have to walk, in that they may be borne, even though they can walk.

Doubting the number of rounds while engaging in sa’y would render it batil. Making an extra, eighth, round with the intention of considering it part of sa’y should render it batil.

11. Once sa’y is completed, taqseer, which is the fifth and last of the obligations of Umrat-ut-Tamatu', becomes due. Clipping some of one’s hair or nails would do; this does not have to be in a particular place though.

12. Having done taqseer, the pilgrim can undo their ihram, heralding the lifting of ban on certain things, apparently including shaving, although one should, as a matter of ihtiyat, not embark on it after the lapse of thirty days from Eidul Fitr. Should one knowingly and deliberately do it, kaffarah, by way of sacrificing an animal, should be paid, as a matter of voluntary precaution. The pilgrims can then resume all the thing/activities which were denied to them during the period of ihram.

13. The pilgrim can also venture out of Makkah to nearby places, such as Arafat, Jeddah, and Ta‘if, if they are confident that they would be back in Makkah in good time for ihram of hajj.

The Obligations of Hajj-ut-Tamatu’

These are thirteen: ihram, wuqaf at Arafat, wuqaf at Muzdelifah, ramy of Jamratil Aqabah, sacrificing an animal, shaving or clipping, tawaf, tawaf‘s prayer, sa’y, tawafun nisa’, the prayer of tawafun nisa’, staying overnight in Mina, and ramy of the three jamarat on the eleventh and twelfth of Thil Hijjah.

14. Ihram. This should be undertaken in exactly the same way it was done in Umrat-ut-Tamatu’. The only difference is the niyyah: niyyah of qurbah here should be made for Haji-ut-Tamatu’. The place for this ihram is Makkah, its time is before midday of the ninth of Thil Hijjah, in such a way that the pilgrim should be able to make the obligatory wuqaf at Arafat.

15. Wuqaf at Arafat. Having assumed ihram, the pilgrim has to be present at Arafat at midday on the ninth of Thil Hijjah till sunset. A delay, however, of one hour after midday can be tolerated. That said, in no way can the pilgrim leave Arafat prematurely, i.e. before sunset.
16. Wuqaf at Muzdelifah. Once it is sunset, the pilgrim should leave Arafat and head for Muzdelifah (Mash'ar). What is required of them there is to be present during the period from dawn till sunrise. This is the most important part of hajj obligations. Clearly, leaving Muzdelifah to Wadi Muhassar slightly before sunrise can be tolerated. However, it is forbidden for the pilgrim to get passed Wadi Muhassar to Mina before sunrise. Spending the night in Mash'ar is not among the duties; it is mustahab though.

17. Once sun shines on the pilgrim in Mash'ar on the tenth of Thil Hijjah, they should make their way to Mina. They have to attend to three types of duties there. Rami of Jamratil Aqabah, sacrificing an animal (hady), and shaving or doing taqseer.

18. Rami of Jamratil Aqabah. Between sunset and sunrise is the time span this duty can be carried out; it has to be done with seven stones thrown consecutively, i.e. not at one go.

19. Hady. It is the sacrificial animal offered by the pilgrim after completing rami discussed in the preceding para.

20. Shaving/ Taqseer. It is obligatory on male pilgrims, not females, to perform taqseer or shave their head, even if it was their first pilgrimage; however, shaving is more superior, as a matter of ihitiyat. Women should always perform taqseer.

By "shaving", we mean shaving the entire head; shaving, not necessarily by uprooting the hair, i.e. by using a machine, can be sanctioned; by "taqseer", we mean clipping some hair or cutting the nails.

21. Once these obligations have been fulfilled, the pilgrims are relieved of their ihram and can resume the things they were denied during the period of ihram, except for wearing perfume, the company of women, and hunting. After that, they should head for Makkah to do the following:

22. a. Tawaf of hajj, which is similar to that of Umrat-ut-Tamatu', except for niyyah.

23. b. Prayer of tawaf, which is again similar to that of Umrat-ut-Tamatu', [except for niyyah].

24. c. Sa'y between Safa and Marwah, which is similar to that of Umrat-ut-Tamatu', except for niyyah.

25. d. Tawafun Nisa' and its prayer, which are similar to those of Umrat-ut-Tamatu', except for niyyah. This applies to both the sexes.

26. Once hajj, its prayer, and sa'y are over and done with, wearing perfume becomes lawful. With tawafun nisa' completed, sexual union between man and wife can resume.

27. These obligations, i.e. starting with tawaf of hajj and ending with tawafun nisa' and its prayer, can be embarked on the tenth or the eleventh of Thil Hijjah. The worshippers are free, though, to delay it beyond these dates, provided that they are performed during the month of Thil Hijjah.

28. The pilgrim is required to stay overnight in Mina on the nights of the eleventh and twelfth of Thil Hijjah. "Staying overnight" means presence in Mina from the evening till midnight and from midnight till dawn. On the day of the eleventh, the pilgrim must perform rami of the three jamarat one after the other, i.e. the first, the middle, and Jamratil Aqabah - which was stoned on the day of Eid. The way rami has to be undertaken is the same as that done on the day of Eid. A repeat of rami should be undertaken on the day of the twelfth. Come the afternoon of the twelfth, the pilgrim is free to leave Mina, having thus fulfilled all the obligations required of him.

This is a brief resume of Hajj-ut-Tamatu'. For more details, you may consult our Manual on Hajj Rituals (Manasikul Hajj).

1. The Differences Between the Two Umrahs

The differences between Umrat-ut-Tamatu' and Umrah Mufradah can be summarized as follows:

29. a. Umrah Mufradah comprises an extra tawaf around the House called tawafun nisa', which is the last of the obligations of this type of umrah, contrary to Umrat-ut-Tamatu' which requires one tawaf only.

30. b. In Umrat-ut-Tamatu', ihram cannot be undone unless taqseer is performed. In Umrah Mufradah, ihram can be undone after either taqseer or shaving has been done.

31. c. As has already been mentioned, ihram for Umrat-ut-Tamatu' is not permissible, unless it is assumed from the meqats. In Umrah Mufradah, it is permissible to wear ihram from Adnal Hil, in the event of not going through those meqats. "Adnal Hil" means before entering the area of Haram around Makkah, which the pilgrim is not allowed to enter without ihram. However, it is correct to say that there is no difference with regard to this point, in that it is permissible to wear ihram from Adnal Hil for those converging on Makkah via routes not going through meqats, or having overshot the meqats while not in a state of ihram; that is, even if it was not for Umrah Mufradah.

32. d. Because Umrat-ut-Tamatu' is part of Hajj-ut-Tamatu' it cannot be performed independent of hajj, contrary to Umrah Mufradah, which is independent of hajj. Thus, those wanting to perform a voluntary umrah without hajj, are required to perform Umrah Mufradah not Umrat-ut-Tamatu'.

33. e. Umrat-ut-Tamatu' can only be embarked on during the months of hajj, i.e. Shawwal, Thil Qi'dah, and Thil Hijjah, whereas Umrah Mufradah is valid throughout the year; however, Rajab is the best month for performing it.

2. Differences Between the Two Hajjs

The differences between Hajj-ut-Tamatu' and Hajjul Ifraad are the following:

34. a. The validity of Hajj-ut-Tamatu' is predicated on the proper performance of Umrat-ut-Tamatu' which precedes it. On the other hand, the validity of Hajjul Ifraad is not dependent on anything else.
35. b. Assuming ihram for Hajj-ut-Tamatu’ takes place in Makkah; ihram for Hajjul Ifraad is undertaken from any of the meqats as is done for Umrat-ut-Tamatu'; the meqats have already been mentioned in para. (6).

36. c. Hady is obligatory as part of Hajj-ut-Tamatu'; Hajjul Ifraad does not require this. However, should the pilgrims in this type of pilgrimage accompany with them a sacrificial animal, it becomes obligatory on them to slaughter it on the day of Eid; such a hajj would then be dubbed "Hajjul Qiraan", in that the pilgrim offers hady alongside hajj.

3. What should the pilgrim in a state of ihram avoid?

38. As we have already mentioned, once the pilgrim assumed ihram for umrah or hajj, they are barred from doing certain things; these are:

a. Hunting wild animals.

b. Sexual enjoyment, be it through intercourse, caressing, or looking at the opposite sex; this includes engaging in marriage contract; haraam too is seeking enjoyment by way of causing ejaculation.

c. Smelling perfume and flowers scent.

d. Beautification.

e. Looking into a mirror.

f. Wearing antimony.

g. Bleeding one's body.

h. Lying and Swearing.

i. Wrangling.
j. Killing insects found on humans, such as lice and fleas.

k. Applying oil to the body.

l. Removing hair from the body.

m. Cutting nails.

n. Dipping the head into water, or liquids, as a matter of ihtiyat.

o. Carrying weapons.

p. Uprooting trees and shrubs in the vicinity of the Haram.

q. Wearing ordinary clothes; this is particularly not allowed for men.

r. Wearing shoes that cover the top of feet, and socks; this is particularly not allowed for men.

s. Covering the head; this is particularly forbidden for men.

t. Tadhleel (seeking shelter in the shade), i.e. of the kind which accompanies the movement of the pilgrim, in day time and while it is raining during night time - as a matter of ihtiyat. Other types of tadhleel during night time are not disallowed. Examples of tadhleel is the pilgrim’s embarkation on a ship, plane, or a car. Another example could be of a pilgrim using an umbrella while walking; this is particularly forbidden for men; however, they are allowed to sit inside a tent or inside a stationary car.

u. Covering the face; this is confined to women.

v. Wearing gloves; this is confined to women.

4. When should hajj become obligatory?

39. Hajj is obligatory on the adult who is sane, free, and can afford the journey; affordability comprises the following elements:

a. Financial capability to pay for one's return journey to hajj, for those wishing to return home; the cost of the outward journey for those who do not want to return home.

b. Peace and security, i.e. personal safety as well as one's property en route and while practising hajj rituals.

c. Having borne the expenses for the journey to hajj, the person should still be able to resume their normal life [style] without undue trouble.

d. The person intending to perform hajj should not be, right from the moment they have the funds for hajj, duty bound to spend it in fulfilling another obligation, such as settling a debt which has become due, provided that the creditor is demanding payment.

40. The provision of financial ability could be waived, if there is a donor who can pledge to bear the cost of hajj for the mukallaf; in this case hajj becomes obligatory, regardless of whether or not they were in debt and so long as their acceptance of the donation had no impact on settling the debt.

2. Hajj by Proxy

Hajj by proxy becomes obligatory in two cases:
41. a. The mukallafs may have the means, yet they could not perform hajj either because of illness or any other reason. In another case, the mukallafs may as well have the means, yet they kept hedging so much so that they became so weak that they could no longer be able to perform hajj personally. Once such mukallafs reach the conclusion that they would not be able to make the journey, they should make arrangements that someone else perform hajj for them; it is desirable though, as a matter of ihtiyat, that such proxy not be among those who have been to hajj.

42. b. Should hajj have become obligatory on someone due financial capability, yet they failed to perform it until they passed away, it is imperative that arrangements be made to send someone to perform hajj on their behalf. The expenses should be met from their own estate according to the following principles:

43. 1. If the deceased did not make any provisions in their will to this effect, expenses should be met from their estate. In such a case, the deceased will be eligible for the type of hajj that is undertaken from one of the meqats, which normally costs not as much as the type of hajj which is undertaken from the deceased's hometown.

Where possible, a local person, i.e. among those who live in the neighbourhood of the meqat, should be hired to perform hajj for the deceased, which if undertaken would do.

Wherever we say, "the expenses have to be met from the estate of the deceased", we mean that such expenses should be taken out from the entire estate first; what is left should, then, be divided into three portions, one of which should go to the deceased. That is, irrespective of the fact that the testator may have stipulated that, for example, their own share be spent in the charitable avenues.

44. 2. Should the deceased have made provisions in their will that hajj be performed for them with the expenses met from their own estate, spending from the estate for the type of hajj that is undertaken from his own hometown must be arranged. However, if the executor of the will goes against the letter of the will by paying for the type of hajj that is undertaken from the meqat, because it is cheaper, the deceased is absolved of the responsibility and therefore there will be no need for repeating the hajj.

45. 3. If the deceased had stipulated that hajj has to performed on their behalf and that one third of their estate be designated for other purposes, their will should be complied with. Expenditure arising from hajj to be embarked on from their hometown should be met from the estate, then the one third should be set aside from the remainder.

46. 4. The deceased may have made provisions in their will that expenditure of a varied nature, including hajj, must be met from their bequeathable one-third. If their own share was sufficient enough to meet all the expenditure, then be it. If not, in that it may be sufficient for a half of all those liabilities, half of the expenses of hajj should be met from the share of the deceased and the other half from the remainder of estate.

47. The inheritors may know that the testator was financially capable of making the journey to hajj, yet they do not know if they performed hajj. In such a case, they must forgo an amount of the estate sufficient to hire someone to perform hajj, from the meqat, on behalf of the deceased.

48. Whoever passes away with a liability for Hajjatul Islam, arrangements have, as a matter of ihtiyat, to be made, in the same year they die, to hire someone to perform hajj for them. It is not permissible to postpone this to another year. Delay in making the arrangements for sending someone to perform hajj should not be justified on the account that no one could accept the wages offered for performing hajj, from the meqat. Failure to do so should result in meeting the expenses, for the type of hajj that is undertaken from the deceased's hometown, from their estate.

Should the person to be hired to perform the proxy hajj ask for a higher than usual wages, provided that no one else can be found to undertake the mission for less, it is obligatory to accede to his request, as delay to another year cannot be sustained.

49. Someone may pass away leaving an estate which has liabilities for both khums and money for performing hajj by proxy. In this case, priority must be given to paying the khums money; spending for hajj should be met from the remainder. If the estate is not sufficient for both and either khums or zakat is available in kind, it is obligatory to set it aside before hajj money. Should it be a debt, hajj takes precedence.

The person may have stipulated in his will that hajjatul Islam be performed on their behalf from their estate, despite the fact that it carries a liability for khums. The executor of the will must settle any khums liability first, then meet hajj expenses from the remainder. It is not permissible for him to pay for hajj from the estate which still has a khums liability.

50. Should the entire estate not be sufficient even for the minimum amount of expenses for hajj, hajj should be waived. The estate should therefore be divided among the heirs, provided there is neither debt nor [any other provision in the] will. The inheritors should not stand to supplement the expenses for hajj from their own property. They are not responsible too for contributing any money for hajj, should the deceased have no estate. This is irrespective of whether or not the deceased did stipulate in their will that hajj by proxy had to be undertaken on his behalf.

51. Hajjatul Islam may become obligatory on a person. Death has come sooner than performing hajj. He did not make any provision for performing hajj by proxy. Someone has come forward and pledged to perform hajj on their behalf gratuitously. The estate should all go to the inheritors. That is, they are not required to contribute anything from it towards the expenses of hajj for the deceased.

Assuming that the same person made a provision in his will that expenses for Hajjatul Islam be met from his own marked for this purpose be sufficient, it should be defrayed from the estate too.

58. Should the cost of hiring someone vary according to the quality of the hired person, it is imperative that someone, of a quality commensurate with the [social] status of the deceased, be hired. This, of course, should be the case, even if (a) higher fee is going to be paid, (b) the cost is not going to be met from the share of the deceased, i.e. the one-third, and (c) there may be among the heirs a minor or another one who might not agree to this.

However, there is ishka! (it is a grey area) in hiring for hajj, if it constitutes a burden on discharging other financial liabilities of the deceased, such as debt and zakat, etc. for which the testator have made provisions in his will.

59. Someone may owe the deceased a sum of money. The deceased has a liability towards Hajjatul Islam. The debtor has his suspicions that if he were to pay back the debt to the heirs, he would not use it for Hajjatul Islam. In this case, the debtor have the right to spend of what he owes for hajj on behalf of the deceased. Should there be any money left over, he should return it to the heirs. As for the way he intends to pay for the hajj journey, he may either hire someone to do it or embark on it himself as agent for the deceased.

The Mandator and Agent

As you may already know that you cannot hire an agent to perform Hajjatul Islam for the deceased, unless it had become obligatory on them and they did not undertake it in their life time, or they were well to do, but could not perform hajj personally for a good reason.

60. As for voluntary hajj, deputizing someone to perform it can be embarked on behalf of the dead and the living alike, provided that the mandator is Muslim.

Hajj by proxy can be effective, irrespective of the state of the mandator, i.e. be they a discerning boy, adult, sane, insane. Shia or Sunni.

61. There are, though, certain requirements which the agent has to fulfill so that the hajj they undertake be good enough. This, of course, is irrespective of whether the agents were hired or they volunteered to do it gratuitously.

a. Adulthood. Hajj would not be good enough if it was undertaken by a boy, even though he may be capable of rational action, as a matter of ihtiyat. That is, insofar as Hajjatul Islam and other types of obligatory hajj are concerned. However, a voluntary hajj performed by a boy with the blessing of his guardian should be valid.

b. Reason. Appointing an insane person as agent [to perform hajj] is not permissible. That is, regardless of the state of insanity of the person, whether perpetual or transient; if transient, he should not be employed during the periods of attack.

There is no harm in using an incompetent person (safih) for agent.

c. Faith.
d. Physical Fitness. It is not permissible to hire someone to perform hajj by proxy who, it is known for a fact, is not in a position to carry out voluntary devotions; this ruling is based on ihtiyat. Even if such person volunteers to do the job, deeming their work as valid is problematic.

However, there is no harm in hiring someone who is known for taking to that which is haraam for a pilgrim in a state of ihram, such as tadhleel, be it for, or without, a good reason.

The same applies to him who, even deliberately, drops certain obligations of hajj, i.e. of the kind that would not detract from it, such as tawafun nisa' and staying over in Mina the nights of the eleventh and twelfth of Thil Hijja.

62. Should a person become duty-bound to perform hajj for himself in a particular year, he is not allowed to neglect such a duty for the sake of undertaking to perform hajj for the others. However, should he go ahead and do it through carelessness, not ignorance of his responsibility towards hajj for himself, hajj by proxy should be deemed valid.

63. Q. Is it possible to hire such a person to perform hajj by proxy in a year when they know they have a responsibility to perform hajj for themselves?

A. Such hiring cannot be sanctioned, if the prospective agent is aware of their responsibility vis-avis hajj.

Q. Should such hiring take place, is the person who entered as a party in the hiring be liable for any payment of money?

A. The agent is eligible for the going rate of fees, in that should the fee stipulated in the hire agreement be more than the going-rate, the agent should not demand the excess amount because the hire is batil.

64. Hajj by proxy does not have to be carried out on behalf of the mandator of the same sex. That is, men standing in for women and vice versa can be sanctioned. Nor does it make any difference whether or not the agent has already been to hajj.

65. There is no harm in deputizing one person to perform voluntary hajj for a group of people. This, however, is not allowed in obligatory hajj.

66. It is permissible for a group of people to act as agent, in a given year, for performing hajj for one person, regardless of its individual intentions. That is, they may all mean to perform Hajjatul Islam by way of ihitiyat on the basis that each one of them may think that the others work may not be up to scratch; or it may be that some may have intended to perform a mustahbab type of hajj and the others an obligatory one.

67. The deceased, for whom a person was hired to perform hajj, is not going to be absolved of the responsibility just for the mere arranging of such a hire. Hajj by proxy can only stand the deceased in good stead, if it is proved that it was carried out in a proper manner. This applies to a living person who enters into a contract for hajj by proxy.

On this premise, in discharging their part of agreement, the agents have to be trustworthy; better still if they were known for their probity and reliability.
Voluntary Tawaf

68. Although tawaf around the Holy Ka'ba is part of both umrah and hajj, it is also an independent act of worship in its own right. Thus, it can be embarked on, even without the need for the worshipper to perform wudhu for tawaf itself. However, wudhu has to be performed for the prayer that normally follows that mustahab tawaf, for no prayer can be accepted, if there has been no wudhu.

A voluntary tawaf performed by a traveller (musafir) is more superior to a voluntary prayer, contrary to those living in Makkah for mustahab prayer performed by them is more superior than voluntary tawaf.
Section six: Kaffarahs
Foreword

1. Literally, "ka-fa-ra" may have a number of meanings, including "denial, obliteration, and cover". Technically, "kaffarah" means "what is paid to redress an imbalance or to compensate for commissioning a sinful act, i.e. a kind of punishment or penalty".

This penalty or expiation is defined by the shari'a in accordance with the type of shortfall or sin; it may take the form of financial penalty, such as feeding a specific number of poor people, or clothing them; it could be personal, such as fasting and abstaining from some of life's necessities and luxuries.

Every kaffarah is an act of worship; it should, therefore, be embarked on with the niyyah of qurbah. It can only be accepted from Muslims.

2. In paying kaffarah, the worshipper's objective should be seeking forgiveness for his trespasses. Should there be more than one kaffarah, each of which must be identified when paid. This, of course, is irrespective of whether the kaffarah was that for commissioning a particular sin a number of times or for a number of different sins.

3. a. Should the worshippers deliberately break their fast, for one day, during the month of Ramadhan, they become liable to pay kaffarah, as has already been mentioned in the Chapter on Fasting the month of Ramadhan. The kaffarah for flouting the rules and breaching one's fast could take one of three forms: (a) emancipating a believer, (b) fasting for two months, or (c) feeding sixty poor people.

If the worshipper decided on choosing one of these three, it will be accepted as an expiation for one's sin.

4. The kaffarah is repeated commensurate with the number of days that fasting has been breached. However, should the worshipper halt their fast by, say, eating at one occasion and drinking on the other on the same day, this should not attract more than one kaffarah.

5. Having sexual union, or masturbation, twice on the same day should attract two kaffarahs. Having sex, or masturbation, and committing other things that invalidate fast would result in becoming liable to two kaffarahs for all the breaches; this is based on voluntary precaution.

6. b. Should the worshipper holds a lawful covenant with Allah, the Most High, only to break it, he should stand to pay the same kaffarah mentioned in the preceding para.

7. c. Whoever makes a lawful vow (nadhr), then violates it, must pay a kaffarah which could be any of the following: (a) emancipating a person or (b) feeding or clothing ten poor people. Inability to do either should lead to fasting for three successive days.

8. d. Whoever takes a lawful oath, i.e. by saying, "By Allah", then does not keep their word should choose one of the following: either: (a) emancipating a person, or (b) feeding or clothing ten poor people. If this is not feasible, fasting for three successive days should be observed.

9. e. If a man swears by the Almighty that he would refrain from sexual union with his wife for at least four months, it is obligatory on him to abrogate such an oath and resume his normal life/relation with his wife. This is called iela.

But when husband annuls his oath and returns to having sex with his wife, a kaffarah, the same as that mentioned in the previous para., becomes due.

10. f. Should the husband resort to dhihar (consisting in the words of repudiation: your are to me like my mother's back - anti alyya kadhahri ummi), and this was amenable to lawful conditions, the wife becomes out of bounds to the husband, until he pays a kaffarah, which could be emancipating a person; should this not be feasible, fasting for two months, or feeding sixty poor people is the alternative. This is called a "fixed penalty".

11. g. Should a person kill another by mistake, they should pay kaffarah, which is the same as the one mentioned in the previous para., i.e. freeing a person. Should there be more than one taking part in the killing, each one of them must bear a kaffarah.

12. h. If someone breaks his i’tikaf by having sexual intercourse, the i’tikaf shall be rendered batil, as has already been mentioned in para. (9) of the Chapter on I’tikaf. Kaffarah should, therefore, become due. As a matter of ihtiyat and obligation, he should be liable to the same kaffarah as that of the husband who resorted to dhihar.

13. i. If someone kills a believer wrongfully, he should pay kaffarah as well as receive the appropriate punishment. Should punishment not be coming soon, he has to settle the kaffarah, which can take be all three, i.e. freeing a believing slave, fasting for two months, and feeding sixty poor people.

Should there be a number of people who took part in the killing, the same punishment and kaffarah should be meted out to every one of them.

14. Some jurists are of the opinion that whoever flouts the fasting of any day of the month of Ramadhan, by committing a sinful act, such as drinking alcohol or committing adultery, they should end up facing the same kaffarah mentioned in the previous para. However, we do not think that this should be obligatory on such a sinner.

15. j. Should the worshipper, who is engaged in compensatory fast for any days missed during the month of Ramadhan, break their fast sometime in the afternoon, they become liable to kaffarah, which takes the form of feeding ten poor people. If this is not feasible, fasting for three days would do.

16. k. It is forbidden for man to swear by way of disavowing either Allah, the Exalted, the Prophet, or the Imams. Should this be done, the person would be deemed sinner; he should therefore incur a kaffarah, which is feeding ten poor people.

1. A kaffarah by way of gift of bread, rice, flour, or any other type of foodstuff, equivalent to three quarters of a kg. should be paid in the following cases:

17. a. The worshippers may have outstanding days to fast from the previous month of Ramadhan. Should they be careless as not to fast until the following the month of Ramadhan has come, they are liable to a kaffarah equivalent to the number of days, i.e. one kaffarah for each day, as has already been discussed in the Chapter on Fasting the month of Ramadhan.

18. b. A sick person did not fast the month of Ramadhan. Their sickness lasted till the following the month of Ramadhan. Such is not required to observe compensatory fast. Instead, they have to compensate for each missed day of fast with giving away three quarters of a kg. of food.

19. c. Old men and women, who are licensed not to fast and pay fidya instead (see paras. 21-24), can do with kaffarah. However, kaffarah here does not precisely mean some sort of penalty for committing a sin, rather a compensation.

There are, though, other kaffarahs which become due on the pilgrim, in a state of ihram, for umrah or hajj, for commissioning certain things which they are not allowed to do because of their ihram. These are discussed in some detail in our "Manual of Hajj Rituals - Manasikul Hajj".

20. At times of mishaps or bereavement, some women shear their hair or beat their face. This type of reaction does not warrant a kaффarah. However, such women have to repent, go back to their senses, arm themselves with patience, and submit to Allah's decree.

21. No kaффarah shall be due on sexual union while a woman is in a state of haydh, although she is deemed guilty; she must, therefore, ask Allah's forgiveness.

22. No kaффarah shall be due on the person who slept without saying isha' prayer until the morning after. However, it is desirable, as a matter of voluntary act of worship, for them to fast that day.

Emancipating a Slave

As you may already know that "emancipation" is among kaффarahs where the mukallaf is given the choice of one of three types of kaффarah; in others it is a "fixed one", i.e. it is obligatory to stick to it alone, unless it proves not feasible to pay. In a third category, emancipation is part of the kaффarah, i.e. in addition to other kaффarahs.

23. In all these cases it is imperative that the person embarking on emancipating a slave be Muslim, that his aim is desiring nearness to Allah, the Most High, and that he aspires that his sin be forgiven.

At any rate, freeing a slave is called for in itself as it is ranked among the best of devotions; Allah has said, "But they would not attempt the uphill road, and what will make you comprehend what the uphill road is? (It is) the setting free of a slave, or the giving of food in a day of hunger". (11-14/90). Above all, it is an act of worship because niyyah of qurbah is a prerequisite for its validity.

24. If freeing a slave is not feasible, the worshipper can choose one of the other two alternatives when the kaffarah is of that ilk. Should the kaffarah be ordinal, fasting should be chosen. But, if it is one among others, freeing a slave shall be dropped and substituted for asking for forgiveness; the rest of the kaffarahs have to be discharged.

25. Freeing a slave should prove inconceivable, when there are no slaves to free or when the worshipper cannot afford buying one in order to set him free.

Fasting

Fasting is one of the three alternatives of kaffarahs; it also occupies the second place in the ordinal type of kaffarahs, and thus it becomes obligatory in the absence of freeing a slave. In the third category of kaffarahs, fasting is added to the other kaffarahs.

26. In all the cases of fasting by way of kaffarah, fasting should be observed for two consecutive lunar months. For example, one could start from the first of Muharram till the end of Safar, or from the fifth of Shawwal till the fifth of Thil Hijjah, and so on.

However, should the worshipper fast the whole of the first month, and one day of the second month, they are allowed to fast the remainder of the second month not necessarily in one go. In the example just cited, having fasted Muharram and one day of Safar, the worshipper can clear the outstanding days of Safar by instalments. In the second example, fasting six days of Thil Hijjah should mean that the worshippers have already fasted one month and one day; accordingly, they are allowed to clear the backlog intermittently.

27. On this assumption, should the worshipper, observing fast by way of kaffarah, break their fast at any stage before completing one month and one day of the second month, they should start again. In breaking the cycle of one month and one day, they would have cancelled out all the days they may have fast.

The exceptions are halting one's fast for a valid reason, such as sickness, unexpected travel, or realizing that Eid, during which fast is forbidden, falls within the fasting period, forgetting about niyyah of fast on some days, or in the case of women haydh may set in. In all these cases, the worshippers should resume their fast as soon as the cause of calling the fast off has been lifted.

28. Where the worshippers are given three alternatives to choose from to absolve themselves of the responsibility of the kaffarah, they may resort to that which is easier for them to deal with. That is, when fasting becomes unfeasible. If kaffarah was of the second category, i.e. ordinal, and both freeing a slave and fasting cannot be embarked on for justifiable reasons, feeding poor people should be the alternative. Should the kaffarah be of the third category, i.e. a number of kaffarahs at the same time, the unfeasible one should be dropped and replaced by asking for forgiveness; the remainder of kaffarahs have to be discharged.

29. Fasting becomes unfeasible when the worshippers are unable to fast two successive months, or doing so could prove very hard and put them in an untenable situation, or fast could endanger their health.

Feeding, Clothing, and Gift-giving

Kaffarah of feeding could entail feeding either sixty or ten poor people. Feeding sixty poor people could become obligatory as one of three alternatives; it could also become obligatory as a last resort in the ordinal type of kaffarah, when both freeing a slave and fasting become unfeasible. On a third count, it becomes obligatory as part of other kaffarahs.

Feeding ten poor people could become obligatory by virtue of being one of three alternatives in the kaffarah of taking an oath (yamin). In another instance, it becomes obligatory by virtue of being the first on the list of ordinal kaffarah, such as the case in breaking one's compensatory fast.

30. Feeding should be made available to a definite number of people, i.e. sixty, in kaffarahs, other than those of taking an oath and breaking one's compensatory fast (qadha'), as those require feeding ten poor people.

Feeding May Take Two Ways

a. Preparing food for the required number of poor people either collectively or separately in one's home, in a restaurant, or in any other venue. The quantity of food should be sufficient enough for everybody to take their fill. As a matter of ihitiyat and obligation, the food should be of the average quality the worshipper and members of their family usually eat; this should be particularly so when it comes to the kaaffarah for taking an oath.

b. Offering each one of them three quarters of a kg. of bread, wheat, or flour. Indeed, it goes without saying that it is permissible, in kaффarahs other than that for taking an oath, to give away the same weight in rice, dates, moong beans, or any other staple food.

It is desirable, though, that he who is landed with a kaффarah for dhihar and decided to discharge it by way of distributing bread, or the like, to increase the weight to a kilo and a half, instead of three quarters of a kg.

31. Anything short of these two forms of going about feeding is not acceptable. For example, resorting to paying the poor the equivalent of those weights in money would not do; nor would giving all the sixty or ten shares to one person or a lesser number than that specified by shari'a law.

However, it is permissible to pick and mix according to the two forms already discussed in (a and b).

32. The Requirements that have to be Fulfilled by those to be Fed:

a. Poverty.

b. They should not be dependent, for their livelihood, on the person paying the kaффarah, such as their offspring and parents.
33. Just as it is permissible to feed grown ups, so is it permissible to feed the young. Whoever chooses the first way of feeding can feed children without the need to obtain the permission of their guardians. The number of children fed count as that of adults, i.e. feeding sixty children to their fill should count as feeding sixty adults. However, should the second form of kaffarah, i.e. by giving away certain quantities of food to children, be chosen, this has to be handed to their guardians.

34. Clothing ten poor people is one of the three alternatives of discharging the kaffarah for taking an oath. It entails giving each one of them one or, preferably, two garments.

35. As has already been discussed in paras.(19-21), giving away three quarters of a kg. of either bread, or a similar type of foodstuff, by way of gift is a kind of kaffarah or compensation called fidya.

The person discharging it must aim at coming closer to Allah, the Most High, in that it is a kind of expiation, as has been ordained by the Law-giver.

36. The recipient should be among the poor. In case there is more than one fidya, the worshipper can dispose of all of them by giving them to one person. Giving away its equivalent in money cannot be sanctioned. Nor is feeding allowed.

37. Once the month of Ramadhan has come to a close, those who are licensed not to fast because of old age, and the like, fidya becomes payable.
Those who have a fast liability because of illness that continued till the following month of Ramadhan, fidya becomes payable on the arrival of the following Ramadhan and not before that, even if they may be aware that their illness drags on.

This also applies to him who keeps postponing compensatory fast until the arrival of a second Ramadhan, i.e. fidya is payable on the advent of a second Ramadhan.

General Guidelines of Kaffarah

38. Should a person, liable to a kaffarah of any type, become unable to discharge it, asking Allah's forgiveness is obligatory on them as an alternative.

39. Should a person be landed with a kaffarah, it is desirable, as a matter of voluntary precaution, for him to hasten to discharge it, although this is not obligatory. Postponing its payment, or paying it gradually is valid; the person should not be deemed sinful.

40. Should the worshipper be in any doubt as to whether or not he has done anything which may entail paying a kaffarah, he should dismiss it outright.

However, knowing that a kaffarah of a sort has become due, yet the worshipper is not quite sure whether or not he has discharged it, settling it should be the way out.

Maybe that a number of kaffarahs have become due. Yet, the worshipper is not sure of the number. If, for example, he thinks that the number was between three and four, they should make do with the lesser of the two figures, i.e. three in this case.

Becoming aware of a breach of one's fast of the sort that entails a kaffarah, yet the worshipper was not quite sure whether he was engaged in fasting of the month of Ramadhan or a compensatory fast, they should resolve the matter by feeding sixty poor people; he may do with feeding ten poor people only.

Should the worshipper be landed with a kaffarah of the type that gives him a choice of three alternatives, yet he is not sure whether it was for breaching his fast during the month of Ramadhan or not keeping his pledge (ahd), he could embark on it with the intention of seeking expiation for what he has commissioned, although without specifying what it was.
